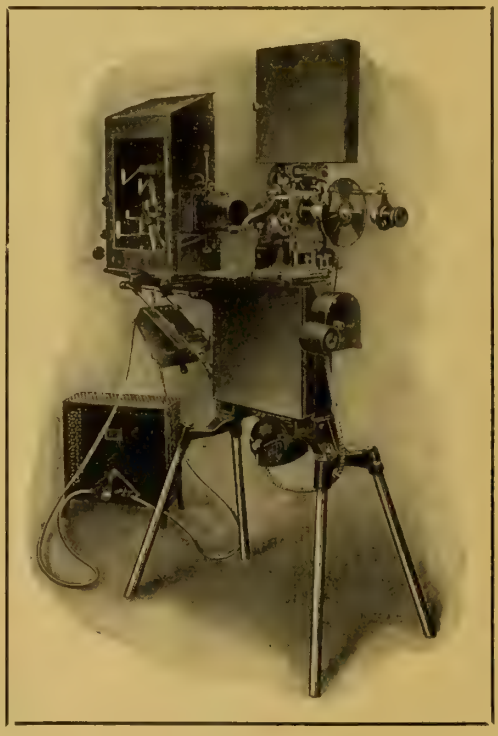
PROJECTION

Power's has developed this to the highest point of efficiency—pictures absolutely without flicker, clear and steady.

PARTS

Interchangeable, easy of access and constructed of the best material that money can buy; and all made by us, bearing our name and guarantee.



OPERATION

So delicately adjusted that a child may run it, though it always does a man's work—and without noise.

No More Dark Screens, No More Interrupted Pictures

Our new 6A is equipped with our patented loop setter device, which will re-set the lower loop automatically without stopping the machine.

These are but a few points, which make for Power's supremacy. It partially explains why we have made over 6,500 installations of the No. 6 and 6A in every corner of the world.

You Get Perfect Publicity With "Undine"

EVERY Thanhouser two-reeler is a "Perfect Publicity Feature." Every method that means perfection in motion picture advertising—the use of one- and three-sheet lithos, of illustrated heralds and illustrated slides, of lobby displays and of halftone cuts—is brought to your easy reach for these features. "Undine," a marvel-picture adapted from the famous Riverside Classic of that name, is in two reels. It is therefore in the "Perfect Publicity" class. Two one-sheets and a three-sheet from your exchange. Illustrated heralds from Hennegan & Co., Cincinnati, O. Cuts for newspaper and circular advertising (2-column), 50 cents apiece, from Standard Engraving Company, 560 Seventh Avenue, New York City. Slides, 30 cents apiece, from Novelty Slide Company, 20 E. 14th Street, New York City. (Released Tuesday, September 24.)

"For the Mikado" Next in the Japanese Series

THIS is the second of the one-reel features produced by our special Japanese Stock Company, headed by Miss Taku Takagi. All are real depictions of real Japanese life by real Japanese Photo-players, and about the finest novelty ever offered the Photofan. Remember: Japanese plays will be the rage on Broadway this fall! Here you have a really "exclusive" proposition—no other film maker has a Japanese producing company.

(Released Tuesday, October 8.)

After "Undine" is "Put Yourself In His Place"

AFTER you have exhibited "Undine" and played a return date with "Lucile," get ready to feature "Put Yourself in His Place," to be released in two reels in October. It was filmatized from the popular story by Charles Reade, which has been read by countless thousands. It is a "perfect publicity" feature, of course. (Watch for the release date)

THE THREE-A-WEEK

Sunday, September 15.

ORATOR, KNIGHT AND COW CHARMER.

A story that is typically and charmingly American, dealing as it does with newspaper editors, angry politicians, newspaper cartoonists and angry cows. The surprise end is the cartoonist. SHE is pretty, also clever. Her cleverness with the sketch pencil caused the whole rumpus that caused this film.

Tuesday, September 17.

THE MAIL CLERK'S TEMPTATION.

A railroad mail clerk falls in love with a hotel man's daughter, but there is a quarrel and in a pique she throws him over and accepts a drummer of large salary. The mail clerk feels the sparseness of his own pay has lost him the girl, and resolves to get rich at any cost. His first plunder is a returned ring and a note—and miraculously he is spared from further temptation.

Friday, September 20.

TWO SOULS.

He was a mere race track "bookie" and she an unfortunate who threw herself from a city dock in the hope that death would end her misery. He jumped in after her, rescued her, and later they were wed. Then the law came after him for an old crime, and he went to prison manfully—and unknown to the lost soul he had saved. How he tried to keep all knowledge of his fate from the one who worshipped him, is the story, and it is one that thrills.

"A Woman of Arizona"

A strong, vigorous drama of the Far West, portrayed with rare skill amidst the grandeur of the rugged hills. Showing how a brave woman took the law into her own hands and revenged a bitter wrong.

Released Thursday, Sept. 12th.

"The Listener's Lesson"

A unique and laughable bucolic comedy of two old spinsters who "rubber" over the phone, and the dire results it brings on. Portrayed with that snap and vim that characterizes all Essanay productions. Howard Missimer, Lily Branscombe and Eleanor Blanchard in screamingly funny roles!

Released Friday, Sept. 13th.

"Billy McGrath's Love Letters"

Another humorous adventure of the popular Billy, with John Steppling in his well-known portrayal. A plot entirely out of the ordinary, snappy and replete with good old-fashioned laughs.

Released Saturday, Sept. 14th.

"Broncho Billy Outwitted"

Mr. G. M. Anderson in the famous role he has made a household word throughout the film-world. A big, gripping, and intensely powerful Western dramatic subject portrayed as only this master of photoplay craft can. A feature for your feature program!

Mme. Bernhardt Seen Here in Motion Pictures

Mr. Daniel Frohman Gives Private View of Films Showing Actress in "Queen Elizabeth."

Mme. Sara Bernhardt as an actress in motion pictures made her American début yesterday afternoon in the Lyceum Theatre before a few spectators, who were present at the invitation of Mr. Daniel Frohman, who recently became managing director of a new motion picture firm called the Famous Players Film Company, the purpose of which is to present well known players of the legitimate stage in the plays that have won fame for them. Mr. Frohman and his associates set out by acquiring the rights to the pictures of Mme. Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth," a play in four acts by Mr. E. Moreau, recently produced by the actress herself in Paris.

BERNHARDT FILMS SHOWN

Private View at Lyceum Theatre of the "Queen Elizabeth:"

An invited audience witnessed the first running off in this country of the "Queen Elizabeth" films yesterday afternoon at the Lyceum Theatre. This was also the first exhibition given by the Famous Players' Film Company, of which Daniel Frohman is managing director.

The play "Queen Elizabeth," which in a series of highly effective scenes tells the story of the love drama between the Queen and the Earl of Essex, was acted in Paris before the motion picture machine by Sarah Bernhardt and her own company.

The scene setting and costuming of the piece are superb, while the running off of the films is done with such smoothness that there is hardly a trace of the usual wavering and vibration which demand of the motion picture "fan" such a tough and tireless eye.

Talk is cheap and self-praise is no recommendation. We leave it to the press—then to you to tell the world that

Bernhardt in Films; News of the Theaters

THE PICTURE-FED public always has impressed us as being divided, like Gaul, into three parts—the prosperous, albeit Calvinistic followers of Burton Holmes and Dwight Elmendorf, the idle sidewalk population of the loop district and the nurse maids and infants of the suburbs. But at Powers' this week there is a new sort of moving-picture audience. Whether it is the great name of the divine Sarah, the magic of "Daniel Frohman presents" or just interest in a more or less new dramatic form, we do not know, but it remains a fact that the film appearance of Mme. Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth" is attracting typical Powers' audiences.

At the matinee on Wednesday the house was more than comfortably filled by a characteristic matinee crowd for that theater, quiet, attentive and very well dressed. The entertainment seemed as effective as if accompanied by the spoken word, and the audience gave sure signs that it was pleased with what it saw.

Louis Reeves Harrison in Moving Picture World says:

DUBLIN DAN

The Three Reel detective play is "replete with dramatic incident * * * and is a winner." He further says "Mr. Belasco has produced melodrama; so has Mr. Daly; so has the fertile Dion Boucicault. They punished vice and rewarded virtue—after piling up catastrophe after catastrophe and were often received with applause more enthusiastic than that heard in pretentious playhouses * * * Dublin Dan will be a winner. It is crowded with incident and adventure from beginning to end."

THE SPRY SPINSTERS

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18th, 1912

A number of young girls board in a house separated from a vacant adjoining house by a party wall. Into this neighboring house move a number of bachelors seeking quiet and recuperation. The girls next door conspire to make the bachelors' life miserable. They masquerade as old maids and gather a dozen cats to help them in their plans. The furious bachelors decide to marry rather than expose themselves to cat music. The funniest thing yet.

THE LIFE OF A ROSE

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 20th, 1912

A pretty story delicately woven around the life of the rose from time it buds into bloom in the Spring days of love to the time it fades and dies in the Winter of despair. Full of pathos and dramatic intensity.

The Magnet People Can't

IMP

"THE INTRIGUE."
Monday, Sept. 9th.

A military picture featuring the rascality of a Jap who endeavored to secure United States submarine plans. Fascinating with its realistic intensity and brilliantly acted climax.

"HUMAN HEARTS"—Two Reels.
Thursday, Sept. 12th.

A genuine crowd magnet. A picturization of one of America's most famous melodramas, adapted from a play that has packed 'em in at a dollar a seat for seventeen years. It is so popular and has such an indefinable charm that it will bring them in droves. Abounds with intensely romantic incidents.

"DOLLY, THE TOM BOY."
On the Same Reel:

"DICK'S PREDICAMENT."
Saturday, Sept. 14th.

Get your handkerchief ready. You're going to shed a few tears of laughter. The funniest Imps you ever laid eyes on, and you've had quite a few that were simply screams.

NESTOR

"IN THE SAN FERNANDO VALLEY."
Monday, Sept. 9th.

A startling dramatic plot. One that will cause the red corpuscles to go hurtling through your body. Thrill after thrill will bring a shiver down your spine. Powerfully presented and attractively produced.

"THE MAN WITHIN."
Wednesday, Sept. 11th.

An extremely well told sensational story of happiness, despair, desolation and death. Just enough pathos and Western spirit to make it a worth-while release. A clean-cut romance that grips you right away.

"THOSE LOVESICK COWBOYS."
Friday, Sept. 13th.

A splendid comedy. Original, novel and chuck full of genuine fun. A real Western pot-pourri of devilishment and wild antics of three cowpunchers. YOU'LL make a hit when you show it.

GEM

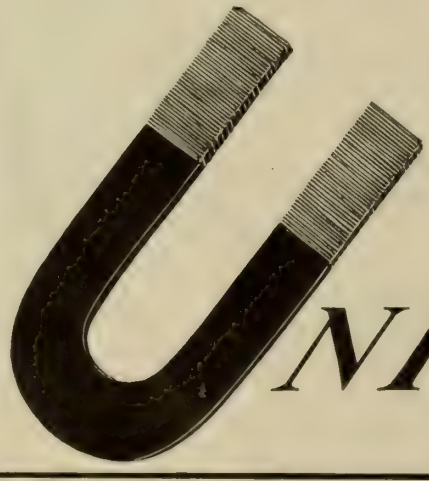
"THE TURN OF FATE."
Tuesday, Sept. 10th.

A genuine startler. A picture that will be greeted with rounds of applause. It will score a great big success. This is a real box office record breaker. Magnificent in perfect photography, unequalled for realism. A release that will live forever.

CHAMPION

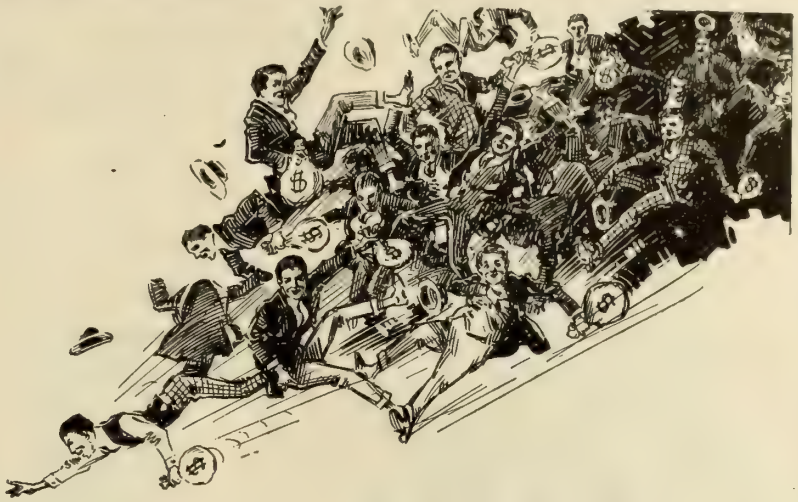
"THE TRYSTING TREE."
Monday, Sept. 9th.

A simply adorable romance with most perfect settings and highest type of production. The kind of release that will please the most cynical. It's good for a week's showing.



UNIVERSAL FILMS

That The Resist!



BISON 101

"A WHITE INDIAN."
Tuesday, Sept. 10th.

GET A COP. GET TWO COPS. You'll need 'em to keep the crowd in line when you bill this great big Westerner. Unequalled for realism and mass mobilization. Simply wonderful battle scenes and views of life in the settlers' camps. Hundreds of Indians, horses, settlers, etc. A Bison after your own heart. Go after it now.

"THE GIRL FROM GOLDEN RUN."
Saturday, Sept. 14th.

It will satisfy the most greedy of thrills. Not a moment lags, not an instant when there isn't an H——l poppin all the time. Full of the real Western ginger that you've been wanting us to inject into these Bisons. It's so realistic, so wonderfully intensifying that one thrill follows the other like a streak of lightning.

VICTOR

"ALL FOR LOVE."
Friday, Sept. 13th.

You'll be sad; you'll be mad if you don't get this release. First, because it's a fine big romance that will appeal most strikingly and most completely to the average picture fan, and that's where your money comes from, and not least of all because Florence Lawrence plays the leading role and you know she's inimitable.

POWERS

"HIS FIRST AND LAST APPEARANCE."
Wednesday, Sept. 11th.

Ever seen a real barn-stormer? A stage-struck country boob is victimized by a slick manager of a stranded troupe. If you've been a cynic all your life, this will hand you a laugh that will last for many a moon. A good, lively, spirited comedy.

"THE SUPREME POWER."
Friday, Sept. 13th.

An engrossing drama of pathetic realism. It's the kind of picture that will rivet the attention of every soul in your theatre. Every patron will be in sympathy with it, because it's a story that deals with the actualities of everyday life.

ECLAIR

"THE MARSHAL'S HONEYMOON."
Tuesday, Sept. 10th.

Many an idea has been pressed into service to furnish a laugh-producing comedy. But it's positively too good to give the story away here. Get it and give your patrons a treat.

"THE HAUNTED BACHELOR."
Tuesday, Sept. 10th (Split).

You'll laugh until your jaws hurt—and then some. Sambo's antics are perpetual howl-raisers. Simply immense, this comedy.

"THE RANCHER'S LOTTERY."
Thursday, Sept. 12th.

If Jim could have penetrated the disguise, he wouldn't have been so anxious to dodge the parson and the wedding ring. A pleasingly enacted little farce with a barrel of funny situations.

"A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE."
Sunday, Sept. 15th (Split).

A new way to win a wife. If you have any patrons who are bachelors, for goodness sake, book it and give the poor fellows a chance to get hitched.

"AROUND CONSTANTINOPLE."
Sunday, Sept. 15th (Split).

An animated panorama of those picturesque and antiquated places of interest that abound in and around the Turkish capital.

REX

"THE SQUATTER'S RIGHTS."
Thursday, Sept. 12th.

A picture unrivalled for impressiveness. Splendidly dressed and set in surroundings in keeping with the story. A clean-cut, vividly-told tale with scenes of remarkable emotionalism.

"LOST—A HUSBAND."
Sunday, Sept. 15th.

Novelty of plot. That's what pleases your patrons. But it amuses them particularly when the story is one of those frivolous mirthful kind. A bright and humorous picture play full of smilingly diverting situations.

MILANO

"THE WEDDING GIFT."
Saturday, Sept. 14th.

A master dramatization of natural incidents. It abounds with tense situations that will cause your heart to flutter with excitement. It's a real star for your Saturday program.

George Hartzwell is not a bad fellow, but he will go out with the boys and neglect his pretty wife. Emma gets tired of it, and summoning up all her courage resolves to "go for him." George comes home one night with a glorious jag, and Emma lets go. The scene being over, Hartzwell tumbles on the sofa to sleep it off. He dreams and sees things—a giant, men with animal heads, and other terrible things. In his struggle to get away from the spooks he rolls off the sofa and finds his wife bathing his poor head.

Facts and Comments

OUR esteemed contemporary "The Literary Digest," in a recent issue, devotes a portion of its space to what it calls "the pictures of the Life of Christ recently taken in Palestine." This is the way the Digest looks at the matter:

"They (the manufacturers) took a company of actors and a moving picture machine to Palestine."

Just what the writer means by speaking of "a moving picture machine" in connection with the cinematographic reproductions in the Holy Land would be hard to guess and we fear the writer's own definition would be about as clear as a thick autumnal fog. It may seem a small matter, this ludicrous confusion of a camera with the instrument of projection, but it is altogether characteristic of the dense and invincible ignorance which still prevails in supposedly cultured circles whenever the motion picture is discussed. We are informed in the course of the article that a number of religious weeklies, chiefly of the Roman Catholic persuasion, are fearfully troubled and ready to launch all sorts of anathemas against what to them seems like a sacrilegious undertaking.

We cannot understand this attitude, least of all can we grasp the viewpoint of our Roman Catholic contemporaries. At all times in her long and eventful history has the Church of Rome availed herself of such aids to devotion as art could supply. In the days of her greatest power the painter and the sculptor gave their greatest works to the world. In every country in which this church holds sway to-day she assiduously fosters and encourages imitative art. Her churches everywhere show samples of the work of artists in images, statues, paintings, carving and often in architecture. Italy, Spain, France and Catholic Germany abound in historic shrines noted for their works of art no less than the devotion of the faithful. Rather than sacrifice her ancient traditions, that art has its useful and even necessary place in Christian civilization, the Church of Rome has lost millions of its adherents in the middle ages. If she had not defied the iconoclastic fury of the nations on the Baltic coast Holland might today be as Catholic as Belgium. We would with great respect, but with much earnestness, advise the learned editors of our religious contemporaries not to waste their precious time and noble energies in hissing denunciations of the cinematograph, but to possess their gentle souls in patience and after a due allowance for a complete cooling off we would in all kindness and sincerity urge them to devote a little time to the study of history. We are inclined to think that an afternoon with Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic" would prove profitable and only modesty restrains us from mapping out a complete course.

Do these learned gentlemen forget that the "miracle play," which is the prototype of all modern drama, was originated, encouraged and brought to no mean degree of artistic success by the clergy? Do they know that the text of the last survival of the "miracle play," the great decennial spectacle at Oberammergau, has always been furnished by the priests of a neighboring monastery? What the editors of these religious weeklies say about "the money making end of the enterprise" fails to strike us very forcibly. They, too, try to make their newspapers pay a profit on the investment. Giving them full credit for their zeal and good faith, it is reasonable to assume that they charge as much as they can for their advertising space and like to have their readers send in the annual subscription with promptness and dispatch. There's nothing looks quite so bad in this bright beginning of the twentieth century as a combination of ignorance and hypocrisy.

Religion, which is the highest form of teaching, and the motion picture ought to be friends, not enemies. There are not a few men, who realize this and make practical use of the motion picture for the purpose of religious teachings, but the best is yet to come. The motion picture is essentially a modern weapon and the child of a highly developed civilization. Churches often battle with weapons of a medieval pattern, antiquated and ineffective. A great and useful invention like the motion picture should not be neglected or despised by the churches at a time when, according to common knowledge and report, the churches have no small difficulty in preserving their ancient power and prestige.

A PROFESSOR of a Western university goes on record as disapproving of the motion picture as an educational factor. He says the motion picture does not stimulate the faculties and makes learning too easy. The subject is too big to be discussed fully in a short paragraph, but we would like to ask the professor whether the growing mind, say from six to twenty years, is not helped rather than hindered by easy methods. The great fault of modern education, especially in our own country, is an attempt to force mental growth and to overload the mind with book knowledge. Now nothing is surer to create a distaste for learning and education than such hothouse tactics. Nature wants the mind to unfold gradually. The best man can do is to adjust education to the laws of nature. An easy absorption of knowledge favors the gradual development of the mind and lays the foundations of a proper mental training and discipline afterward. The systematizing and ordering of the knowledge acquired, the ability to strike a just proportion in the things needful to the mind, the task of determining the relative values of what has been learned, are functions which cannot be performed by the motion picture. These latter processes in the shaping and building up of the mind, however, should never be begun until the mind has been properly stored with positive knowledge. The storing of the mind can best be accomplished by the motion picture in every branch of learning with the sole exception of pure mathematics.

THE committee in charge of arrangements for the third annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, which is scheduled to take place in New York City on July 7, 1913, has adopted a resolution looking toward the holding of a World's Cinematograph Exposition in New York at that time. The suggestion looks good to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

The Old Showman.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

YOU will meet him here and there, loitering about the lobby and telling of the days when "Way Down East" and "Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model," used to draw crowded houses, or he may be whiling away his time informing live managers how to run the picture exhibitions. For him there is never to be any improvement on the drama of mock heroics. "Give the people something they understand," he says, with the sublime egotism of a man who once really knew something about a recessive phase of human nature, perhaps when he was associated with a seedy side-show attached to a wornout traveling circus.

Sometimes these derelicts get their views published in theatrical papers when the editors are hard up for copy, and we are given an entertaining glimpse of that form of intellectual atrophy which senses its own superiority and weighs heavily upon the individual who imagines "the public" to be a large body of incoherent inanity, the individual who draws a line between himself and those who sit in front and wonders in the end at their stupidity.

The Old Showman never learns anything on his own account—he does not read the papers. Tell him that Rostand received $150,000 advance money for his last play before he finished it and the thick-noodled one will say "You will have to show me." Tell him that fifty companies were producing one of Maeterlinck's plays in all parts of the world at the same time, and the Old Showman will inform you that he is from Missouri. He has heard somewhere that Bill Shakespeare was an ignoramous like himself before he got into the business, and he contends that nothing Bill ever wrote held a candle to "The Limited Mail."

I once had a controversy with the bright and interesting author of "The Limited Mail"—he had studied that portion of the people who patronized his play when I was in my critical pantalettes—and I was amazed to find a man so well informed maintain that the greatest dramatists entered the field by way of the stage door. From out of the mystery of Shakespeare's life shines the torch of his early literary achievements—he was a poet before he was a playwright. He was famed as a poet before he ever stepped upon the stage. So was Rostand. So was Maeterlinck, who was also a brilliant essayist before he wrote his first drama. Ibsen, a man of college education, was first a poet. Dumas Fils was first a poet and novelist. Bernard Shaw was first a novelist, and so was Ohnet. La Fontaine, Sardou, Racine and Moliere were all men of college education, the latter two graduating with high honors in literary departments.

The wide appeal of such men was due to the fact that they studied human nature from a broad point of view—most of them swept the range of literature in their time before they undertook to strike a great universal note. The moving pictures circulate all over the world—their language is one all nations understand—and it would be largely to the interest of those producing them if they never responded to the demands of that Old Showman who now and then runs the little theaters. Their directive influence must be that of men of wide scope if they are to maintain the splendid popularity built up at home and abroad.

I read in the last issue of this paper an interesting account of how a live exhibitor went into towns where moving picture shows had failed or met with only mediocre success and bought up the weaklings. In his application of modern methods he sent free tickets by the thousand to the best people in town, and he advertised extensively in papers that the best people read. He made no effort to limit his audience to those of narrow comprehension, and he gave them the best photoplays he could obtain. He won in every instance without employing vaudeville artists, but he offered fine music as an accompaniment to the photodramas. He found that he was able to provide a $5,000 pipe organ where his predecessor had used an antiquated piano, and he turned a losing venture into a paying one by reaching out to discriminating taste.

This man's criticism of feature plays is one of the best I have read from exhibitors—I wish they would express their opinions more freely—especially in relation to the lack of tension in many of the larger plays. He says that the subjects are not well chosen and a lack of tense continuity often leaves an audience cold at the end of the introductory reels. According to his view the action should begin early enough and have enough strength to awaken interest before the end of the first reel is reached. The Old Showman is at work in the studios, trying to make what has suited people in days gone by live up to modern enlightened requirements.

A weakness in the stage play, as well as in the photoplay, seems to lie in a managerial misconception of what is popular. We may go too far from those who come to the theaters to be entertained as well as err by aiming below the average of modern taste. The golden medium seems to lie along lines of strong heart interest in what is presented, with a close analysis of modern feeling in the characters, rather than in novelty of incident. There is no doubt that novelty is of value, but are we getting much of it in the adaptation of old and stale productions?

What the exhibitor in question really means in his pointed criticism is that not enough sympathetic interest in the characters is aroused during the first reel for the audience to really care what happens in the second. They are cold when the second begins and only watch it with idle curiosity because the prime essential of characterization has been neglected. Take a scenario dealing with the situation of a man who has poisoned himself because of his wife's supposed infidelity only to discover that he is mistaken when it is too late, and the average editor would grab it as a gem, especially if there was a thrilling chase for the antidote involved. Now, what does the audience care whether the fool of a husband dies or not if he has not been so presented as to win a place in the affections of those watching his visualized drama?

There are few Old Showmen among the scenario selectmen, but they are obliged to consider the autocratic Old Showmen who direct plays in the studios, and many of the latter are still strumming the monotonous instrument of one string, sensationalism. Simply take a human character as it is generally recognized, make that character known to those watching the play as a human being of flesh and blood, a creature struggling as we all are between natural impulse and the higher sense of what is fit and right for us to do, and interest of the audience will be nailed to that leading figure because there is something of us in this eternal conflict.

If the heart of the leading man or woman in the story is bared to the audience in the first reel, or if this leading man or woman is shown in battle with external influences, if we are given some reason to care what happens, the crisis will be awaited eagerly. Even the Old Showman will sit up and take notice.

"Geronimo's Last Raid" (American)

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade

A FINE two-reel subject, to be handled as a regular release, on September 12th, has been produced by the American's Eastern company, under the direction of Mr. Emerson. The title is "Geronimo's Last Raid," but it must not be inferred that the treatment has been historical. A romantic story has been built around the famous Apache chief, in which he figures prominently and picturesquely; but the main interest does not center in him, but rather in the love tale in which the daughter of a major in the United States Army and two young officers are concerned.

There is action, and lots of it, for those who like clashes between Indians and the settlers, and who are stirred by the dashing attacks of United States cavalry and cowboys on the redskins; but, amid all these desperate contests out in the open, in the big exterior scenes, one is most agreeably treated to a number of excellent studio scenes, showing social and family life in the little army encampment in the far Southwest. The officers' ball at Fort Sill is quite a pretentious affair, the handsome uniforms of the men and the fashionable dresses of the ladies adding to the air of distinction which characterizes the select gathering. This is decidedly the finest effort yet put forth by any director in the new American studio, the light effects being artistic and the action most fitting. The technical department is also to be congratulated for good work in printing and developing.

Scene from "Geronimo's Last Raid" (American).

In some of the big exterior scenes the cameraman has operated his instrument at too long range. This has resulted in hazy definition, which creates in the mind of the spectator a feeling of regret that he is not up close enough to get a better view of several exciting incidents. In all fairness, however, this two-reel subject merits high commendation for the care taken in its production and, in the main, for good photography.

Pretty Pauline Wilkins fell promptly in love with dashing young Lieut. Parker, who arrived at Fort Sill, Okla., full of ambition to assume his first military duties, after graduation from West Point. Pauline is the daughter of Major Wilkins, commanding officer at the fort. Lieut. Parker was also smitten at first sight, but found that his ranking officer, Captain Gray, was a rival.

Captain Gray endeavored to plan the downfall of Lieut. Parker, but was unsuccessful, until one day an opportunity presented itself in the billiard room at the fort. The Lieutenant and a friend were engaged in a game when Captain Gray entered. The latter seated himself at a table on which Parker had thrown his coat. The coat fell, and a photograph and a letter dropped from one of the pockets. Captain Gray seized the photograph and discovered that it was one of Pauline. On the back he read: "From his sweetheart to one of the dearest fellows in the world." Incensed, Gray now read the letter. He found that it also was from Pauline. The closing sentence caught his eye. It read: "Of course Geronimo's escape would mean an advantage to you." The context clearly explained the innocent meaning of the sentence, viz., that if Geronimo escaped while Lieut. Parker was at the fort, that officer could gain fame and advancement by capturing him. Detached from the context, the sentence, it can be seen, was full of danger for the Lieutenant, in case it fell into the hands of an enemy. Captain Gray pocketed the letter and photograph.

At this time, so the story goes, Geronimo was a prisoner at Fort Sill. At night Captain Gray visited his cell and whispered to him a plot for his release. Later on, while the guard was at a remote spot on his beat, Gray released Geronimo. After doing so, he carefully left on the scene the fragment of Pauline's letter to Parker, and also the photograph.

When Geronimo's escape was made known to Major Wilkins by the guard, he immediately sent out Lieut. Parker and a troop of cavalry in pursuit. Then, accompanied by Capt. Gray and other officers, he visited the cell. Gray saw to it that the torn letter and the photograph got into the Major's hands. The latter, on reading the damning sentence, ordered Gray and his command to follow Parker, and arrest both him and Geronimo.

Scene from "Geronimo's Last Raid" (American).

Everything then seemed favorable to the Captain, but small things sometimes change the course of a big current. Before setting out, Captain Gray delivered his sword to an orderly and instructed him to bring his revolver from his quarters instead. When in the Captain's room the orderly discovered on a table a letter addressed to Lieut. Parker. This he secreted and afterward turned over to Pauline, having a suspicion of the Captain's conduct. That young lady immediately saw the whole plot, with Capt. Gray's perfidy and her lover's innocence. Hastily mounting a horse, she set out to overtake Parker and prevent his arrest by Gray.

Geronimo, however, had already taken the war path and he and his braves were between Pauline and her lover. The Indians sought to exterminate a caravan of settlers and, for her own safety, Pauline joined the latter. A fierce attack was made by the Apaches and the settlers were nearly doomed when Parker's troopers arrived. Even they failed to turn the tide and all were slaughtered save Parker and Pauline. Parker hides his sweetheart in a water barrel, and she saves him from being burned alive by shooting his tormentors through the bung hole. He then flees for succor to a cowboy encampment. The cowboys arrive in time to rescue Pauline and, afterward, the command of Capt. Gray, which has been caught in a trap by Geronimo.

Lieut. Parker is placed under arrest by Capt. Gray, and the journey to Fort Sill is made. There Pauline shows her father both fragments of the stolen letter and explains that she wrote it. Capt. Gray is disarmed and placed under arrest, prior to the court-martial that expelled him in disgrace from the United States Army.

Who Are the True Progressives?

Progressivism is not necessarily confined to politics. While these are days in which those in the lead in the affairs of the world are dividing and being divided into either progressive or reactionary parties, others are looking on in wonderment, asking "Where are we at?" True progressivism deals with the greatest advances in everything, and applies them to the greatest good of the people, even if, in doing so, radical changes have to be made.

The art of progressivism is really and only the art of adaptability. In the present political struggle progressive minds are using that most progressive of instruments to illustrate progressive doctrines; without doubt these are true progressives. If, as is conceded everywhere, the moving picture is the greatest product of the times, its best advocates and users are filling the conditions of true progressiveness in applying its uses to the good of the people. Its use politically, while a compliment to its power, is not necessarily a tribute to its worth. The application of cinematography to the universal enlightenment of humanity is suggestive of the truest, highest and greatest progress.

Increasing educational facilities, decreasing educational drudgery, the solution of social and economic problems, social reform work, the exposure of disease cultivating conditions, with the attendant methods of either preventing or overcoming both the cause and effects of those conditions, is beyond question the greatest moral and physical progressiveness of the hour in all the world. Those who make their mission in life the using of such advantages can truly be classed as true progressives; of such was the late J. P. Chalmers, and the list of his followers is not small.

The recent national convention brought to the front many who are laboring earnestly and thoroughly for the noblest ends of applied cinematography. Are there many reactionaries? Certainly there always are and probably always will be. Jealous of a cause in which they cannot help, insufficiently acquainted with its value, they fear its good only because they have not lent their aid thereto. Progress is an irresistible force, an on-rushing Niagara; powerful as an aid, destructive to opposition.

The highest progress must be durable and permanent; for this purpose it must not be contaminated with that which will either detract or corrupt it. True progressives aim to secure this purity within the bounds of their principles. Let these ideas pervade the leaders and followers in the art of cinematography down to the commonest use of the moving picture in the cheapest places of the humblest resorts and they will find many opportunities to become true progressives and benefactors to all classes.

The Picture Speaks Louder Than Words

This is an old saying in a new form, with a newer and more vital truth.

Sometimes it is a debatable subject as to which is the most serviceable of the senses; however that may be, there is little doubt, but that sight is the most profitable one. The impressions of the eye control the actions of all the faculties. The relative value of those things which enter by the eye, and the ear, are without doubt largely in favor of the eye; as many important impressions are both large and instantaneous, while the hearing is slower and deliberate. In teaching this is proved to be so in a very large degree, especially with young children, when the picture is used where words are impossible.

The hearing may be limited to but one language, the seeing is a universal language; the hearing is subject to a certain educational standard of comprehension, the seeing is immediately understood by the ignorant or deficient. Oral teaching often requires elaborate explanations hard to understand; sight teaching is at once simple and self explanatory.

These comparisons and illustrations may be continued without number; they are, however, well known to every intelligent person. With this truth standing clear, that the picture is mighter than the word in such multiplicity, to what an inexhaustible extent will the moving picture prove capable? How often we have proved that a picture is more valuable than a book, making a minute more profitable than many hours. An evening in a picture show has filled a void only days of reading could have supplied. To one who for instance had never read Uncle Tom's Cabin; which might require many days if only spare time could be given to the reading; the seeing of the pictures in one hour and a quarter not only covers the story, but at the same time has taught one of the most important circumstances in the history of America, and the following influence upon the whole world. This picture is mentioned only as a conspicuous sample, there are scores like it. Another result of the power of the picture is that it leads to a discriminating reading which is on a much higher educational scale. Little is produced in the picture that is not of the highest value in the reading, the picture acts as a guide, censor and instructor in the choice of the "world's best literature."

As such it becomes a doubly powerful educational factor, in that it enforces the illustrative by the more detailed and explanatory. It is now being given forth from public libraries that since the advent of the picture, the standard of reading as shown by the books called for is of a higher, broader and more educational character. All evidencing the power of the picture and increasing its educational possibilities, without usurping to itself any field of learning, or causing the detriment of any other. On the contrary it is leading all others along more useful lines, it is excluding the superfluous and unnecessary, it is analyzing the whole field of pedagogical possibilities, retaining the gold and eliminating the dross.

If "the weakest goes to the wall" the most powerful must rule; this is exactly the position occupied by the picture; it is proving itself the most powerful, and by its power making easier whatever it may be adaptable for; its nearest co-operator is speech, it is giving leadership, tone, and strength, to the spoken word, imparting new power to the written word; thereby increasing its value while enlarging the scope of its usefulness. The Picture speaks louder than the word, is heard further, penetrates deeper and becomes an eternal force for good.

"Sundered Ties"

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

IT is interesting to note the drift of moving pictures from Indian plays towards dramas of the the Revolution and the Rebellion, especially in the case of a company that has shown the early struggles of settlers and redskins on a large and important scale, because this tendency closely coincides with that of American stage presentations during the last hundred years. The rough and tumble character of cowboy epics, with their strong vitality and abundance of movement, corresponds to the earliest pictures of physical heroism in the history of the American drama to be succeeded in popularity by pictures of historical epochs of a patriotism-inspiring nature, and an ultimate study of social conditions during our struggle for existence as a nation, such as "Sundered Ties," just produced by the New York Motion Picture Company.

Sundered were ties of blood at the beginning of the Rebellion as well as those of individual interest, of social duty and of lofty patriotism. It was a time for men to reach decisions of vital importance in a few days and assume great risks in defense of hasty judgment. The young man of the south being educated at West Point or Annapolis occupied a cruelly hard and difficult position. As a good soldier he was bound to defend the flag irrespective of local prejudice or influence. As a man of character he must repay the government equipping him with an education by loyal service in the field. On the other hand, he must do battle against those he loved, who had brought him into the world, to whom he owed the very essence of what was manly and high-spirited in his nature.

The Southern cadet had to settle for himself whether he would stand by that part of the country that gave him birth or be loyal to the flag which he had sworn to protect under any and all emergencies. As to the relative nobility of his motives in either course, "Sundered Ties" does not deal, but it depicts the perplexity of a young officer's situation when invoked by his family to aid the Southern cause in opposition to his own perception of what was right and just under the circumstances.

In the self-conflict of John Stevens at the beginning of the Civil War lies the essence of the drama—a man's struggle between those sweet influences that appeal to his emotional nature and the sterner ones which regulate his sense of justice affords dramatic material in wellnigh exhaustless quantity. Too much cannot be made of it in the critical moments of a play. John Stevens, lieutenant in the regular army, U. S. A., arrives at his Southern home just before the war, when brave and intelligent men all over the land were at the parting of the ways.

Every conceivable influence is brought to bear upon him to renounce allegiance and faith long established by his vocation and mature development. A mother pleads; a father reasons; a sweetheart entreats; and their welfare as well as their desires concern him deeply. They have all habitually influenced his mind, but he cannot be turned from what his own moral sense has pronounced to be his duty. He might shrink from any violation of a principle from purely benevolent purposes under ordinary circumstances and reach a decision without effort, but here is a case with much to approve on both sides, with a great preponderance of affection on the rebellious one. It takes the highest form of courage for him to renounce all that he holds dear for a principle, but his strength of character decides for him and he leaves to join the company in which he belongs at the moment war is declared.

The drama of conscience settled, that of actual war begins, and its tragedies are glimpsed as the struggle between Brothers of the North with Brothers of the South becomes more bitter towards the end of that terrible conflict which exhibited as much as any period of our history the unwisdom of violence in adjusting the affairs of men or nations. Older men are drawn into the fray, and among them Colonel Stevens. We are given realistic scenes of actual warfare, artillery operations, infantry movements and cavalry charges at a time when the action nears the Stevens homestead, when father and son appear in the opposing forces.

On one side the blue lines are drawing in with inflexible purpose, that of ending the bloody struggle at any cost; on the other is shown the desperate resistance of men in gray who have fought, hungered and thirsted for long years with hardly a decisive victory to animate and inspire them. The real soldiers on both sides were sick of the devastating and destroying fight, but were pressing fiercely to a conclusion from the North with consciousness of duty nobly done and resisting from the South with the almost invincible valor of those who prefer to die where they stand than yield an inch of precious territory.

A detachment of Union soldiers appears near the Stevens house—they were working their way forward as skirmishers—and effect a deployment with a final line to the hostile front, but they are subject to a murderous fire at times and suddenly discover that some concealed sharpshooter is picking off the officers at headquarters with leisurely indifference of consequences. This small detail delays the movement so seriously that a squad is sent in search of the Rebel who is sending rifle ball after rifle ball into vital spots without discovery or punishment.

The squad proceeds slowly and with caution through woods and thickets unfamiliar, where any one of them may be shot down by an unseen foe posted in some strategic point of impenetrable concealment. Step by step they advance, searching every mound and tree as they go, but at last they are guided by the sharp crack of a rifle—the sharpshooter has not perceived them—and creep up to dislodge the nervy warrior.

It is no one else than a younger brother of John Stevens. Not having been trained in loyalty to the flag, he knows only that of family. Besides, his old dad has gone out to fight the bluecoats, and why should not he The spirit of war fires his brave little heart; he secures a rifle used for hunting, posts himself in a tree having a wide view of the field of action, and there he rests his gun while he picks off the flower of the opposing detachment, the one in which his big brother is doing his duty. The little boy delivers his last fatal shot when the squad of searching soldiers discovers him. They fire in volley and bring him down like a fluttering pigeon.

This affords the most thrilling small incident in the drama. The boy apparently—and probably—does drop from the high perch in the branches with a fall that is enough to kill him. How he is saved to play some other part is the director's secret, but he drops down and is apparently killed on the spot. The men bear his body away in pity—he is mortally wounded—and take him to where his brother is in action. John recognizes the boy and the poor little fellow pays the bitter price of patriotism. The intense and passionate character of the true Southerner is well shown in the ferocity of this child.

Now come the scenes that followed the end of the conflict, when those who had fought nobly in vain, who had fought for their cherished ideas against heavy odds, were to enter a long period of humiliating self-denial if not actual starvation. They did not march home with bands playing and flags flying, but quietly dispersed to take up the afterburden of war in a devastated country and attempt to restore a semblance of its former beauty and fertility. The saddest stories of military history are those of the defeated, those who endured and achieved only to begin a longer and even more hopeless battle for mere existence.

In "Sundered Ties," this part of the picture is relieved by a comedy element, in which a negro butler and fat negress play the leading roles. They are both fat, though the members of Colonel Stevens' family seem to be down to hoecake and water.

Colonel Stevens is destitute and his plantation is in ruins, so he is compelled to seek aid at the house of John Stevens' ante-bellum sweetheart. Her people are not much better off, but the fat butler and the fat cook indicate some secret source of food supply. When the Stevens family comes over to dinner in a neighborly way, two feeble and discouraged old Southern people, with the family of Irene—she is the sweetheart that was—the fat butler goes out on a foraging expedition and cops a plump chicken from the coop of a more fortunate neighbor.

As it goes, the fat butler gets caught red-handed while stealing a chicken for dinner, and it would go hard with him but for the timely arrival of John Stevens. The latter, having vindicated his stand and done service for his country as he had sworn to do, is returning to heal old wounds and bind up the sundered ties when he comes upon the frightened butler under arrest. He manages to liberate the fat coon by paying double for the chicken, and enters upon a secret plan to provide a feast for his own family as well as that of Irene. He buys a great supply of good things and sends them to Irene's house by the predatory butler.

There is a scene of almost Christmas rejoicing in the old kitchen when the fat cook lays hands on the first ample supply of provender she has seen since the good old days "befo de wah." She and the gay butler make merry in their preparations while the crushed old white martyrs gather to what they expect to be more of a feast of the soul than of the body. The dinner is served amid amusement and rejoicing; we are treated to a view of simple happiness, then John Stevens appears, hesitating at the threshold. His mother is first to give him warm welcome, his sweetheart next, and the old Colonel yields in a tender final scene.

"The Massacre of the Santa Fe Trail"

Reviewed by G. F. Blaisdell.

THE followers of motion pictures who look askance at the posters of a "Western" may disregard their usual feelings if their eyes chance to fall on the announcement of "The Massacre of the Santa Fe Trail." The lovers of screen plays portraying Western life, early or contemporary, will be repaid by making some sacrifice to get a glimpse of this picture. It is, of course, primarily a spectacle. Yet it is more than that. There are some thrilling moments, some scenes of real dramatic power. There is, for instance, a thrill when the "gray ghost," a nearly nude man, his beard long and white, suddenly appears to the young man and young woman riding through the woods. There are impressiveness and power and charm in the final scene, where the former Indian sweetheart of the cashiered lieutenant, later the squaw of the same officer turned renegade, stands under the aboriginal aerial burial structure of the good-for-nothing white man and, looking down into the wide valley before her and then up and over the great mountain behind it, slowly raises her arms toward the blanketed figure outlined against the sky.

Frank Montgomery produced the picture. He has put forth a craftsmanlike piece of work. There is coherency, and he has accomplished this with a minimum of subtitles. There is one defect of the scenario, which for dramatic reasons will, if noticed at all, easily be condoned. The frontier army post is in command of a colonel. Under him is a captain. Twenty years later the same officers, holding the same rank, are still stationed at this post. The period covered is from 1849 to 1869—which it is unnecessary to indicate included the years of the civil war. It is a fact that army officers in those days—and yet in later days—put in many years in one grade. So the author has justification for his ground.

Likewise in the opening scene an army officer enters the "canteen" where are many enlisted men and takes a drink. This may strike as unusual many who are aware of the gulf that now exists between the enlisted man and the commissioned officers. In the old days this gulf was more imaginary than real. Long terms of service away from civilization and dangers shared in common went far toward putting sword and musket on an equal social footing.

Among the notable scenes and incidents in these two reels are those of the great camp of Indians—real ones; the semi-tropical surroundings of the Mexican home of Jose Rosarro; the swinging open of the great gates of the estate when the coach sets out for its journey to the States; the scene on the Santa Fe trail—the caravan of "prairie schooners," with the crews of out-riders and armed footguards; the Indians setting out for the attack on the wagon train—their long run down the hill into the valley and up the hill—and the attack; the significant appeal of Mrs. Rosarro to the Indian woman—showing the common interest of all womankind in baby's booties which have as yet no wearer; the short, sharp fight between Juan and the "ghost" and the identification of the former officer by the tattooed flag on his arm; the return of the army troop to the scene of the massacre and finding the melancholy relics of the tragedy, and the later uncovering of the trunk containing the treasures of the Rosarros.

The cast has been carefully selected. Lieutenant George Carson, the leading character, is portrayed by Charles Bartlett; Drowsy Eyes, his Indian sweetheart, by Mona Darkfeather; Juan Rosarro, Roy Watson; Jose and Juanita Rosarro, his parents, Sidney Diamond and Jane Keckley; Betty Roberts, Virginia Chester; Colonel Roberts, Jack Leonard; Chief Rain Cloud, William Bertram; Major Clemens, Lee Morris; Captain and Mrs. Bryce, Warren Ellsworth and Mrs. Dunlap; Doctor, Sam Kofman.

The picture opens at a frontier army post. There are the hospital, the commissary and the "enlisted man's club," the canteen. The interior of the canteen is then shown, with the soldiers seated about. Lieutenant Carson enters, buys a drink, and is handed a small package by the canteen boss. He immediately repairs to his quarters, removes his uniform coat, puts on a civilian coat and slouch hat, takes the suspicious looking package and sets out. He goes to the big camp of Indians, seeks the chief, and with the package, which contains whisky, barters with the head of the tribe for his daughter. The chief consumes the liquor, and while still under its influence and thirsting for more goes to the barracks with little Drowsy Eyes looking for the lieutenant and more firewater. He runs into the colonel, who, upon learning of the lieutenant's action, orders that officer under arrest. He is court-martialed and cashiered. As his uniform is being stripped from him the officers take note of an American flag tattooed on his forearm.

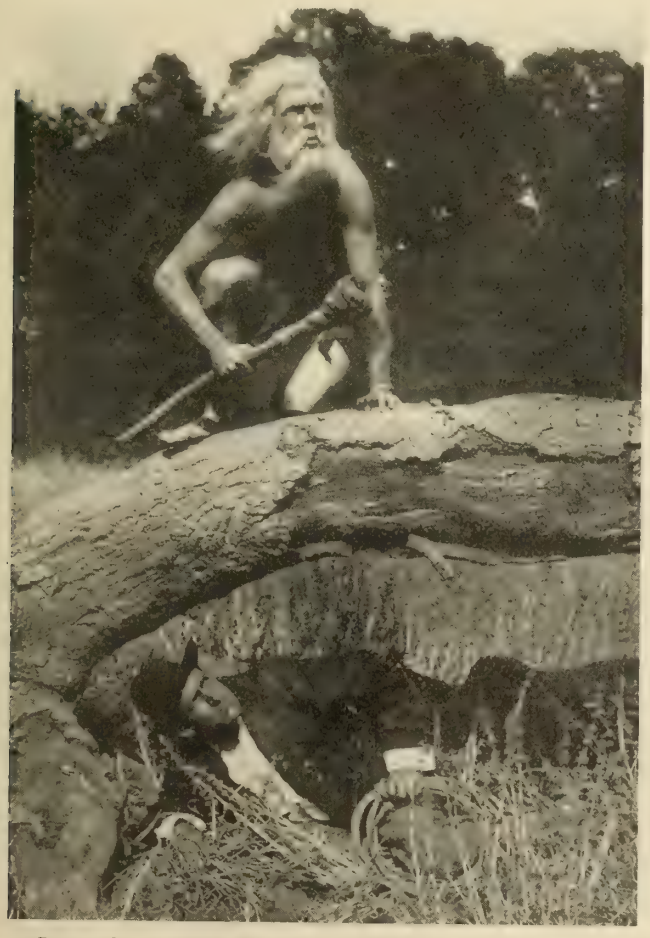
The lieutenant immediately repairs to the Indian camp and seeks admission. Grudgingly it is conceded. The chief throws him into a tent and supplies him with an Indian outfit.



Scene from "The Massacre of the Sante Fe Trail" (Universal-Bison).

Jose Rosarro, a wealthy Mexican, is advised by the family physician to take Mme. Rosarro to the States for the benefit of her health. Jose has a beautiful place and his wife naturally deplores leaving such palatial, luxuriant surroundings for the dangers, known and unknown, of the trail. The doctor prevails, however; the treasures are packed in a solidly-built trunk, the immediate family is loaded into a coach and the relatives and retainers are accommodated in the famous prairie schooners and on horseback. So the caravan sets out through the gates.

The scene on the Santa Fe trail is one to be remembered. The beholder stands on a hill and sees the caravan moving over the smooth turf under a bright sun. It seems as if travel under these primitive conditions must have substantial compensations. Suddenly a wheel comes off the coach. Instantly there are a dozen men at work on it. The women are lifted out of the coach. So also is the treasure chest and put on the ground at one side of the trail.

Carson, the renegade, riding across the brow of the hill, sees the commotion and rides up and dismounts. His eye lights on the chest. Cautiously he lifts it. Two vigilant Mexicans warn him off. Carson has guessed the contents of the casket. He loses no time in returning to camp and arousing the Indians.

A war dance is in progress. It is cut short, however, and the entire force sets out for the scene of the breakdown. The travelers are warned of the approaching Indians and hastily form their wagons into a circle. The fight is on immediately. The Indians break through. Carson and an Indian helper pick out the casket and carry it out of the circle and hide it in the woods. The helper is shot by Carson, who then returns to the conflict. Jose is one of the last to fall. His wife is seized by Carson.

The Indians find a barrel of whisky. They lose no time in getting it open and starting in to consume it. This suits Carson, who now has in view two objects—the securing of the treasure and the possession of Juanita Rosarro. He gathers some poisonous loco weeds and puts them into the whisky. They act as knockout drops. When the Indians are unconscious Carson puts Juanita on a horse behind him and carries her to the Indian camp. Carson returns to the scene of the fight and safeguards the box of treasure.

Drowsy Eyes is jealous of Juanita. The return of Carson alone prevents the Indian woman from killing the Mexican. The little Indian has observed the terror of Juanita. The latter has threatened to kill herself if Carson comes near her. To the Indian Juanita appeals for help. She shows her a pair of baby's booties. It is an appeal to the feminine instinct, and it is successful. Drowsy Eyes just previously has put into Carson's bottle some of the whisky which that rascal had previously poisoned. As soon as it takes effect the little Indian and Mrs. Rosarro mount a horse and ride rapidly away. They reach the army post in safety. They were none too soon, however. An heir is born to the house of Rosarro, but the life of the mother goes out with the birth of the son.

Twenty years later Juan Rosarro is in love with Betty, the daughter of his benefactor, Colonel Roberts. She is in love with Juan. The colonel favors Major Clemens and says so. The major has means. Juan and Betty, however, frequently ride out of camp. On one of these trips they get a glimpse of a white-bearded creature they describe as the "gray ghost." Betty is alarmed. Juan takes a rope and goes on the hunt for the strange man. He conceals himself under a log and waits. The gray ghost appears. He rests on top of Juan's log. Then the ghost sprawls on the sand, fondly patting the ground under him. Juan waits his chance and tries to throw the rope about the ghost. He is not quick enough. The strange man has muscles of steel. In a short struggle Juan's pistol is discharged. The stranger falls.

Juan sets off for camp and brings back the colonel and the captain, and some soldiers. One of the officers turns over the body. On the forearm is plainly seen the tattooed American flag.

A number of Indians pass. They stop and look at the body. A little woman bends over it. She tells the officers that the dead man was a white soldier, which fact they now know, and adds that she was his squaw. The body is loaded on the Indian conveyance and the redmen move away.

Juan is curious to learn what held Carson's attention to the sand. He begins to dig. Just under the surface he finds a large trunk. Willing hands carry it to the post. In the colonel's home it is opened. There is a thrilling scene and a happy one as Juan lifts from the chest a box containing a necklace and reads the inscription on the cover: "Jose to Juanita Rosarro, August 22, 1849." Major Clemens moves from the room. The colonel admits that the trunk's contents removes all his previous objections to the marriage of his daughter to Juan. Everybody but the major is happy.

RICHARD V. SPENCER IN TOWN.

Mr. Richard V. Spencer, the versatile scenario editor of the New York Motion Picture Company, attached to the company working in Los Angeles, Cal., is taking his vacation after a year of strenuous work on "Bison-101" productions. Hearing of the big dinner of the writers of photoplays which takes place Saturday, Sept. 7th, at Coney Island, Mr. Spencer decided to wend his way Eastward, which accounts for his presence in New York.

During an interesting visit at the office of the Moving Picture World Mr. Spencer related some of the interesting incidents of the late unpleasantness in Los Angeles between the "Bison-101" and the Universal people, but said that hostilities had been suspended and that both companies were going quietly about their respective affairs.

It is Mr. Spencer's intention to remain in New York for two weeks or more, returning by easy stages to the coast.

B. Nichols, of London

English Representative of the Biograph, Kalem and Lubin Companies Chats of Things Abroad.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

B. NICHOLS is in town. Mr. Nichols, who seems to own merely "B" as a given name, is general manager of the M. P. Sales Agency, Ltd., London. General Manager is his official title, but like Will Cressy's stage manager, what he ain't isn't, for the title is merely a trade name and Mr. Nichols is sole owner. In the land of limited liability stock companies a trade designation is better than an individual name.

Mr. Nichols succeeded Markt & Co. as European representative and agent for Biograph, Kalem and Lubin films and handles in addition these other brands: British and Colonial, Empire, Welt, Aquila, Cabot, H. & B., Mikado, Duskies and the new brand which will handle the melodramas introducing wild animals and which have been marketed by Gaumont. C. G. P. C. and others. Tigre films will probably be the designation of these.

"It takes tact and hustle to sell film abroad," remarked Mr. Nichols the other day. "It is not merely a case of filling the standing orders of the exchanges. You sell each film on its individual merits, and I do not think that I am far from the truth when I say that the European market has a pronounced influence for good on the American product. It imposes a certain check on the tendency to let down standards, since the European sale represents what you Americans call the 'velvet,' and must be catered to with care.

"It has been my experience—and I have followed the matter closely, that the subject that makes a real hit in England is the one that scores heaviest in the States. Not all American successes are duplicated abroad, but the film that pleases England does the same in the States and is apt to be a better film than the purely American success, not because England maintains a higher standard of judgment, but because the film that makes an international score cannot depend upon some localism. It speaks the universal language rather than a dialect. To put it another way, it is more nearly literature and less an appeal to local sentiment. The world-wide hits are few indeed—films that please England and France, Germany and Russia alike, but if a release sells well on both sides of the ocean it is a pretty certain sign that it is an unusual story.

"Abroad the buying is largely in the hands of some nineteen persons. Of course there are innumerable purchasers of single reels of chosen subjects, but the bulk buying is in the hands of these nineteen men, the large renters and the agents for managements and renters in other countries.

"It is for this reason that the agency handles a large line of brands. We have eighteen releases in our weekly program and, since few of the buyers can visit all the exhibition rooms, they naturally turn first to those places where they can see the largest assortment of releases.

As soon as a subject is received our musical expert looks over the reels and suggests suitable music, trying to keep as closely as possible to selections advised for other reels. This is because these suggestions are embodied in the calendar of releases published in our weekly, The Pictures, which gives in fiction form the leading stories of the companies we represent. By keeping within the fairly ample catalogue of music we have already advised (and in this we favor no especial publisher), the manager of the picture theater is not constantly put to fresh expense for music.

"When a subject is assigned a release date—and by the way I think I can claim credit for having been the first to inaugurate abroad the regular release day for certain brands—the music so selected is noted by our pianist. We have a comfortable little theater on our premises with tip-up seats and all conveniences and each Monday we start to run our program, not the program for the week, but the advance program. We have two operators and two machines and from nine until five each day the reels are run continuously. Nine to five are the regular hours, but sometimes we run up to midnight and it is seldom that we stop at five, most runs keeping up until seven, eight or nine o'clock. We run as long as there are buyers to see. This keeps up until Thursday night. Friday the films are shown in Liverpool and elsewhere in the larger cities until Monday, when they are taken to the smaller towns, the salesman going with them. They keep out until Friday, two men being employed who follow each other over the territory alternate weeks. The orders thus obtained are cabled to the States or telegraphed to Continental makers, the films arriving in time for distribution.

"Normally from five to thirty-five prints of each subject are absorbed in England and about two hundred prints of a popular subject will be sold, but we sometimes run a hundred or more in the United Kingdom alone, where there is a strong demand for first runs of a subject that will be popular. In such cases managements that ordinarily would take a later run make extra payment to the rental agencies for first run.

"More first runs are used abroad than here in the States, and the usual course is to change in the middle of the week, giving two changes a week, though a few offer three. The daily change is hardly known.

"There is strong competition among the houses and I think that the average of exhibition is higher than over here. There are more experienced showmen engaged in the business.

"It is only recently that we have been able to interest the rental agencies in handling paper, though lithographs are more in demand in England than with you. Each selling agent must supply his customers with paper of various sorts and this is put to them at 13 cents for full sheets with a descending scale as the size of the paper increases, some of the larger stands working out at about six cents a sheet. In addition we offer many novelties. We supply the houses with excellent chocolates which sell for sixpence a box, each box containing the postcard portrait of one of our players. We also publish postcards of all favorites which are sold by our theaters and we plan a succession of advertising novelties.

"Personality counts for as much in England as it seems to here and all of this work is done to increase the interest in our players and films and so create a demand for the films we supply. One popular novelty is a sticker a couple of inches in diameter giving the trade mark of a company. These are sent free to all exhibitors and are used in connection with strip titles on program boards and in other ways. All of this helps the sale and is necessary if the demand is to be kept up.

"I do not do much with special releases, nor will these 'exclusives' be of much value to the exhibitor until the makers supply a three-reel story with a three-reel film. The one-reel story in three reels is no more popular abroad than in the States; the chief advantage being that the exhibitor is removed temporarily from competition. I expect much of Kalem's 'The Life of Christ.' There has been a little objection from a certain type of minister, but we have replied to these complaints. We think that the reels and their manner of showing will be their own best answer. I have one contract for a three months' showing as a special, and I do not think that these reels will be shown in the regular picture theaters, but in lecture halls and the regular theaters.

"I think, by the way, that we have a better average of house than over here. In some ways the laws are more liberal, particularly in the requirement to exits, only one side exit being required, the alley being protected by a fire wall of specified thickness. This enables more of the ground to be used for building purposes, and cuts the cost.

"Business abroad is in a healthy condition and still grows. We have by no means reached the top either in development, or for that matter, in production."

MISS SCHAEFER ON VACATION.

Miss Anne Schaefer, of the Western Vitagraph Company, at Santa Monica, California, is visiting her home in St. Louis, Missouri. Miss Schaefer was born in St. Louis, and some of her greatest successes on the stage were made there, as an exponent of Shakespearean roles.

Before she returns to the Vitagraph Studios in Santa Monica, she will call on Mr. Rollin S. Sturgeon's father and mother at Rock Island, Illinois, which is Mr. Sturgeon's native town.

Since Mr. Sturgeon took up the Directorship of the Western Vitagraph Company, Miss Schaefer has been one of his leading women, and she is recognized as one of the best in Motion Picture Art. Her vacation will last three weeks, when she will return to Santa Monica to resume her duties.

PATHE OFFICES MOVE TO JERSEY.

Pathe Freres, on September 6th, moved their offices from 41 West 25th Street, New York, to their new office building at No. 1 Congress Street, Jersey City, N. J. It was found that the New York office was inadequate for handling the ever increasing volume of business and this led to the erection of a new building. The new offices are in a handsome structure which was built with the accomodation of the motion picture business as an object. It is situated adjacent to the Pathe studio and this convenient location, together with the ideal appointments of the new building, will make the new home of Pathe Freres ideal for their purposes.

New Solax Plant at Fort Lee

A Finely Equipped Studio and Factory Representing an Investment of $100,000 to be the Permanent Home of this Popular Company.

By Hugh Hoffman.

FORT LEE, NEW JERSEY, and environs, may in time rival Los Angeles as a motion picture community. It is toward that region, quite close to New York, that Manhattan motion picture directors turn instinctively when they want a good scene without going far from New York City. For a number of years Fort Lee and Coytesville have been a favorite stamping ground. As many as seven and eight motion picture companies have been noticed, all working on the same day, around these two Palisade villages. Only a week ago a humorous incident took place when the Biograph Company was working on one side of a fence while the Reliance Company was using the other side of the same fence, both using the gate. The two directors worked in harmony and with much courtesy, somewhat on the "Gaston and Alphonse" order.

With all their excursions into this particular district, it is rather strange that most of the manufacturing companies located their studios elsewhere, but the reason perhaps was that most of the studios were in rented quarters in the city. However, as the business of manufacturing concerns continues to grow to the point where they feel obliged to erect a studio, it is more than likely that Fort Lee will become the ultimate location of a number of picture making companies. The Champion Company was the first to locate on the Palisades, having a studio at Coytesville. Pathe Freres, after operating further down the State of New Jersey at Bound Brook, finally erected a large studio on Jersey City Heights, overlooking the Hudson River. About a year ago the Eclair Company erected the first plant and studio in Fort Lee and now the Solax Company has just moved into its fine new studio and factory, which has recently been completed at an outlay of $100,000. That more companies will follow their example is hardly to be doubted, as an hour's automobile ride in either direction from that location will furnish suitable backgrounds for years to come. While very close to New York City, the vicinity of Fort Lee affords many varieties of natural scenery. Jersey scenery has been derided by certain critics and writers who probably could not name an equivalent substitute for the scenery of the Palisades without involving much expense for transportation, and other items.

The new Solax plant is a decidedly complete and permanent institution. It is large and roomy and all departments can be conducted there without being cramped in any way. The building is four stories in height, and it is built of brick, with concrete floors and steel girders. The studio proper is constructed of structural iron and glass. The floor of the studio is large enough to accommodate five ordinary stage settings at once, or three extra deep settings. The glass frames surrounding the studio are so constructed as to be easily removable, allowing a full flood of sunlight to enter the place. This arrangement is valuable also for natural backgrounds to interior settings that have windows. The camera, by this means, can record a studio interior with a genuine landscape as a vista.

The entire studio and factory were planned by Madame Alice Blache, the presiding genius of the Solax Company. She is a remarkable personality, combining a true artistic temperament with executive ability and business acumen. Every detail of the making of a Solax picture comes directly under her personal supervision. She takes full responsibility for the Solax product, and, when one considers that this model factory is the result of her work during the two years existence of the Solax Company, her judgment is hardly to be questioned.

In company with Madame Blache the World representative was shown about the various departments of the Solax plant. The itinerary began at the business office, which is a delightful place on the ground floor. Fresh from the workman's hand, it is immaculate with its clean walls and woodwork, the new desks and general office equipment. Everything there sparkled with newness and seemed to breathe out an incentive to good work. About the walls many of the Solax posters were hung in frames. These Solax posters are really posters from an artistic point of view. They are not exactly photographs of scenes from the drama, but are done in broad simple poster fashion, much after the manner of "Harper's Weekly," and other large business firms that are experts in poster advertising. The business office opens directly into the shipping department where the finished product is crated for general distribution. There also the posters are piled in large quantities to be shipped with the films. Over these departments, as all others, the sense of newness spread its crisp charm. Next into the projection room where the finished product must meet its final test, which is the all-seeing eye of Madame Blache. The laboratories and dark-rooms are equipped with machinery that is considered the last word in picture making.

The spacious drying rooms are located directly beneath the main studio offices and have a capacity of drying 6,000 feet at a time on the huge drums. The long joining room is flooded with light and along the window sides are clean sanitary work benches for the girls. The factory superintendent's office and the boiler rooms complete the ground floor itinerary, after which the studio proper on the next floor was visited. Opening just off the main studio floor are various accessory departments. The property room is at one end and next to it is the papier-mache working department. The third room is a property room, containing the more solid and unbreakable articles in great profusion Fourth along the line is the large scene-room where many, many flats are stacked close together. At the extreme right end the carpenter shop is located, and its connection with the scene painting department just above it is ingenius. To get to the scenic department it is necessary to climb a flight of stairs to a balcony that runs the length of the studio.

The scenic artists work directly above the carpenters and at either side of their room is a wide slot through which a sliding frame raises or lowers the scene, according to the desire of the artists. In this way the carpenters and the scenic artists are separated and kept from being in each other's way and yet they are in close touch. The carpenters below build and cover their frames. They are then placed upon these sliding frames and sent up to the scenic artists direct. Along the balcony various doors lead to other departments. Next to the scenic room is another property room for the storing of the more delicate articles, such as bric-a-brac and crockery. The next door down the corridor is the wardrobe room, well stocked for most every requirement. And next to the wardrobe room is the door leading to the labyrinth of dress rooms. The directors room is a comfortable well furnished office, just off the entrance. This section of the plant more resembles a hotel as the rooms are finished in hotel fashion with running water, furniture, carpets, etc. As the World scout peered into the star's dressing room he beheld Miss Blanche Cornwall, the Solax leading lady, who was industriously engaged in beautifying her comfortable sanctum. It surely did look girlish with all the fussy little feminine frills that she had added to it from time to time.

"This is surely heaven," she said. "When I look back and think of two solid years of one night stands that I did before joining the Solax Company."

The men's dressing room is directly opposite and it needs no label to designate it as such. Well distributed cuspidors and a large pinochle table in the center of the room together with muddy boots here and there, and an aroma of well seasoned pipes told the story in an instant. Contrary to general usage, the masculine members of the Solax stock company, by vote, decided that, rather than occupy the individual rooms that were built for them, they would prefer to share together the large room that was originally intended for the extra people, and it was therefore decreed that the regular members will occupy the big room and that the extra people will dress in the smaller rooms. There is only one explanation for this unusual state of affairs and that explanation can be put into one word—"pinochle."

The entire Solax Company, both artists and artisans, as well as business staff, feel the vast improvement of their new environment over their former cramped quarters at Flushing, Long Island. The change has given them all new energy and a new interest in their work, and there is not one of them who does not sincerely believe that Madame Blache is a wonderful woman.

The new Solax factory has a capacity for turning out 12,000 feet of finished positive film per day. Besides the factory building, a large tract of land surrounding it is also owned by the Solax Company, and already an expert landscape gardener is at work laying out the grounds after a plan that will make them into a beautiful park when completed. In this large enclosure the Solax Company will enact many large outdoor scenes that call for extensive scenic preparations and large ensembles. Among all the various motion picture factories, the Solax plant stands today as one of the most complete, if not the largest motion picture plant in existence.

"The Man Hunt"

(Two-reel C. G. P. C. release.)

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is a story of strong passions and tragic situations such as usually accompanies the struggle for individual freedom against the tyrrany of constituted authority, though the characters involved act from instinct that is older than law rather than in enlightened methods. The central figure is a French poacher named Blucher, one of the powerful physical type that was illumined by one great passion during the French Revolution, the passion for liberty, and he is in primitive revolt against those who usurp man's right since the world began, the right to hunt for food.

Opposed to him indirectly are those who deny man's prerogative to follow his earliest and most natural pursuit, who have fenced off wild lands for the amusement of themselves and guests, who have taken possession of the face of the earth and would add that of the sea as well, if, indeed, they would not chase the Creator of the Universe from this section of it in the sublimity of their egotism. Blucher does not reason out questions of preference and privilege. He is a sort of Robin Hood in temperament and inclination and is principally disturbed by the petty authority of the village gendarme, the gaudy equivalent of our country constable. The landed proprietor does not concern him, but he avoids the game-keeping policeman as would a clever scout the organized military force of an oppressive enemy.

The forest is Blucher's foster-mother. He lives in it and from it, but does not limit his nourishment to that obtained from nuts, berries and mushrooms, he snares and shoots with such appetizing results that he brings many a bag of game to the only home he knows, the wretched hut of some fagot-makers, an old woman and her daughter Clara. These two women eke out a bare existence gathering small twigs where the wood-cutters work and binding them together in bundles. In return for the provisions he brings her the old woman cooks for Blucher and affords him shelter in moments of dire necessity, such as arise when the police in cocked hats and long boots set out in ponderous search of poachers among the nearby estates.

As far as the barefoot daughter Clara is concerned, Blucher is a hero—he is her idol. Clara is a graceful and attractive girl of impressionable nature, one of the kind doomed to lose through over-fondness the object of her affections. She is as obviously in love as was Juliet at the bare sight of Romeo, with the same tragic element promised in her complete self-surrender. She worships Blucher so openly that she destroys all the illusion essential to arouse passion in the human male. He tolerates her at moments and treats her with rude brutality at others according to the ebb and flow of sentiment characteristic of his sex.

The poacher is a typical man in many respects. He is stealthy in the pursuit of his purposes, exhibits passionate resentment to interference with what he deems his natural duty if not prerogative, fights like a tiger when cornered, and is not a monogamist. It is true that he is not in love with the daughter of the fagot-gatherer, but he plays with her unhappy predilection when it pleases him, when it flatters his vanity, and her devotion is his principal safeguard.

When circumstances bring him in contact with the pretty daughter of a neighboring and prosperous farmer, a less attractive but more substantial girl called Rose, the poacher pursues his game with the same combination of boldness and stealth that is shown in his forest operations. He is very much of a man. He does not know exactly where he stands when two charming women are concerned because his secret inclinations are to have both, and he naturally prefers the one which will cost him the longest and hardest chase irrespective of individual merit. That is the man of it. He loves better to hunt than to be hunted.

Blucher is, however, hunted by the police. His depredations become extensive, and search is made for the clever poacher in vain. The play opens with a view of him disguised in the clothes of the old fagot-picker, trudging painfully through the forest and picking up game from his traps. Under the feudal system he would have run less risk than now. Under the promulgation of forest laws many priviliges of the poor were taken away that constitute a hardship. The poor creatures who count upon the gathering of faggots and dead leaves to keep themselves warm in winter are now liable under the law, though the administration closes its eyes to minor offences.

The poacher is regarded as the most dangerous of all those who live on the border of great forests. His familiarity with the haunts of game and his remarkable snares of wire or horse-hair serve to make it nearly impossible to catch him, but Blucher is one of the bolder type. He carries a gun and loves the sport. He is suspected, but positive evidence is so difficult to obtain that he pursues his vocation unhindered and laughs at those who try to arrest him. On this occasion one of his traps is found, and he is so closely followed by the police that he makes a perilous escape over a wall near the spot where he knows that Clara and her mother are picking up and binding twigs. He scales the wall, throws off his disguise, hides it in the barrow-load of branches and makes off before the officers arrive. When they appear upon the scene, the women misdirect them.

Blucher's straight road to trouble lies in his sudden fancy for Rose, the farmer's daughter. She is bespoken by a young tiller of the soil named Jack, of honest intentions and suspicious temperament. He dislikes Blucher from instinct and so does the papa of Rose. These four come together at the great gate of a veritable French farmyard, a sort of enclosure of all the important buildings that made it of utility as a temporary fortification in war time. As papa's preference is obviously not for the bold poacher, the interest of the girl is thereby aroused.

The next gathering of all the elements is at a country ball given at the Inn of the Red Lion. This scene is so thoroughly French that it is a source of delight to those who know how true it is to what is going on every day in that great farming country. The "ball" is given out of doors; the dancing is on the green sward; and if anyone imagines it is not enjoyed, a visit to France will be enlightening. No people in the world enjoy themselves more in the open air and more simply than the French of all but a very small class. No matter what goes on in that international playground, Paris, no nation can boast of a more wholesome home life than that to be found among the French country people.

Blucher roughs it with the young farmer and steals Rose from Jack in most approved Bowery style. He carries her away from arbor of the inn, after baiting the very officers who are trying to catch him poaching, and joins the dancers for a while. Clara and her mother appear among the dancers to sell a few flowers they have gathered in the forest, and Blucher makes a diversion by inducing Clara to perform a fancy dance for the assemblage—this dance is admirably done. He then steals away with Rose to the inn arbor and makes an ardent profession of love. He is caught at this by her father and approved suitor and by the unhappy Clara. A general clash of antagonistic elements ensues with disaster to no one but the unfortunate daughter of the fagot-gatherer. The one who loves most truly is the biggest sufferer.

Blucher's methods become bolder and bolder. As a lover he invades the farmhouse and induces Rose to meet him outside in secret. As a poacher he shoots game like a true sportsman. A larger force is sent on his trail, some four officers, and he is caught with the goods in the forest. A remarkable struggle with the police follows in which one after the other is overcome by Blucher after he has been disarmed. He escapes, but he leaves one of his would-be captors badly injured, and his character is unveiled to the farmer's daughter. Rose decides to accept the suitor favored by her father in a scene that is as amazingly comical as it is true to life. The father stands by while the lover is declaring himself and spurs on the young man's ardor.

Now a reward is offered for the apprehension of the poacher—he has injured an officer—and he is surrounded by a small army of important-looking gendarmes on horse and afoot. Again he escapes, but he encounters Rose and Jack in their new relation of engaged lovers and he can not resist a temptation to lick the successful suitor. He will have that satisfaction anyway. He gives the farmer boy a mild beating, and the latter retaliates by playing spy. He stealthily follows the poacher until he discovers his hiding place in the hovel of Clara's mother. He leads the small military force to this hiding place, but they are outwitted when Blucher escapes in the old woman's clothes. Pursuit now becomes so hot that capture is inevitable, but the poacher dares again to enter the farm house.

Clara guesses his destination and flies to warn him that the police are hot upon his trail, but she is too late. There is a swift and dramatic scene between the two women in the farmhouse kitchen, then the entire place is surrounded. In the melee that follows a shot is fired at Blucher which Clara receives in her bosom while interposing to save him.

The structural principles of this play are all fine. Perhaps it will not be so fully appreciated by an American audience as it deserves—it is so intensely French—but it accurately pictures life and conditions other than those familiar to us with absolute fidelity to the subject. Some of the Corot-like pictures of the forest are delightful, and as an exhibition of manners and customs the play is thoroughly instructive.

The motive is the blind assumption on the part of a bold spirit of his freedom from physical and political coercion. The poacher is far from being unpopular in France. He represents a little of what is in a great many people in trying to set up a condition of complete liberty founded on the constitution of Nature. He represents in his own crude way what is now the subject of much academic discussion, the right of every man to live from the soil.

"FILIAL LOVE" (Eclair).

What makes a feature? Thrills, sensations such as trained wild beasts, railroad wrecks, fires and a dozen other et cets. of a spectacular nature, or will a good plain interest-teeming story prove worthy of the name? Eclair's "Filial Love" to be released Sept. 19th is one answer to the general question. It is a plain simple story in-so-far as it does not depend on a complicated plot and a score of confusing characters. It isn't dependent on scenic sensations to keep interest alive. It isn't filled with what is called a love interest wherein a noble hero and still more noble heroine wade through swamps of adventure before they can marry. Not but that all such plays have their value and purpose, yet we welcome a variety.

The story is so very simple that it must get over. It is of a little youngster who thinks his "Daddy" stands next to no man. Their home is in the steel manufacturing territory which borders Pittsburg. The little fellow has seen a stranger borrow his "Dad's" knife and fail to return it. The next day the murdered body of the foreman of the mill department in which the father worked is found and near him lay the knife which the stranger had borrowed. So the little boy's father is arrested on this evidence and held by the Coroner's jury for murder.

The youngster tries to tell of the strange man, but his story is not accepted. Having heard his father often speak of President Taft and Justice he determines to go "higher up" with his "Daddy's" case.

He steals away from home, climbs aboard a train to Washington and persuades the trainmen to carry him through. He arrives and inquiries his way to "Mr. Taft's" only to be refused an audience when he gets to the White House. That night he sleeps in the White House grounds and as he is being awakened the next morning by a guard, a crowd of the usual curiously inclined gather about and among them the little hero recognizes the stranger who borrowed his father's knife. Jumping on the bench he points him out and commands the policeman to arrest the man. Something in the child's dominant sincerity compels the policeman to credit the child's accusation and the man is arrested, taken to the station house and there confesses. A telegram is sent to Pittsburg. The jury is just about to render a verdict of guilty when the message arrives. The youngster has saved his "Daddy."

The play is unusually filled with mighty interesting views and settings, those of Washington being particularly fine. Little Clara Horton carries the burden of the story and the force with which she puts it over would do credit to even the stars of the silent drama. Mr. Johnstone is also worthy of a word of praise for his thoughtful, sincere presentation of the accused father.

A Quintet of Leading Players in Gaumont's Two-Reel Subject, "Kings in Exile."

"KINGS IN EXILE" (Gaumont).

On Thursday, September 19th, the Gaumont Co. is to release "Kings in Exile" in two reels. This is a subject which was written especially for the Gaumont Co. of Paris, in connection with a recent prize of 500 francs which was offered for the best scenario submitted. The production is from the pen of August Barriere, who has captured several similar prizes for modern dramatic originalities. In Europe the play was put out in four reels, but it has been reduced on this side to a two-reel version. This means that the two thousand feet are full of action. It is probably one of the swiftest moving pictures dealing with monarchical life that has yet been put out. The Gaumont Co. assures us that "Kings in Exile" is the most dignified picture they have yet offered and it combines with this quality that of massiveness, scenery, beauty and perfect detail. The part of the young prince is played by Mr. Maurice Vinot; the part of Denise Marvel, the actress, is portrayed by Miss Yvonne Marie; the character of the queen is placed in the hands of the inimitable Renée Carl, while the character of the General Dimitriki is portrayed by Mr. M. Manson. The detective is the character study and work of Mr. M. Navarre, who is pre-eminently qualified for a character of that kind. This production is not handcolored as has been heretofore rumored. It is black and white except such portions as are tinted and toned.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

AFTER an absence of about seven weeks, S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Co., has returned from a European trip, during which England, Ireland, France and Germany were visited. Mr. Hutchinson was accompanied by his eldest son and combined the business of his company with sight-seeing.

According to Mr. Hutchinson's impression, the moving picture business has just about recovered from a period of depression in Great Britain. The long continued strikes wrought considerable havoc among exhibitors, and their inability to pay rentals resulted in the bankruptcy of several renting establishments which, in turn, led to considerable loss to manufacturers of film, both in Europe and America.

London still leads in high class picture theaters, and the tendency is towards still more palatial structures. It is still not only possible, but the rule, in London, for exhibitors to get two shillings (50 cents), admission for a program of five reels in first-class houses. And then, it must be remembered, the program is changed only twice a week.

The American office in London has a traveling representative, who makes a tour of all the principal cities in Great Britain every week, for the purpose of demonstrating and keeping in touch with the attitude towards the American product. From what I can gather, it appears that buyers of films in Great Britain have an inclination to judge of a film by their own tastes rather than from the viewpoint of the exhibitor, who is in a much better position to know what his patrons want. Films of American make, both Licensed and Independent, are popular in Great Britain, with Western subjects still in favor. Historical subjects, of American interest, are not in demand; but comedy and drama are good business getters.

Mr. Hutchinson is much pleased with the continued demand in Great Britain for films made by his company. Mr. Kerrigan of the Western company is exceedingly popular throughout England, Ireland and Scotland.

Germany has placed an embargo, practically, on all films of foreign make. The aim is to protect German manufacturers against all others. This has resulted in the lowering of the public taste, for films of German make are notably poor in quality, and inferior in subjects. Picture theater goers in Germany betray a liking for what is suggestive, and this would appear to indicate that the cultured and intelligent classes are not patrons of German picture theaters. I understand, however, that some of the highest class picture houses present programs selected from films made in America, and that the audiences are representative of the better element.

In France there is a more liberal attitude towards the product of foreign make; but still there exists an undercurrent of good natured disparagement in favor of the home product.

Mr. Hutchinson is impressed by the outlook in Russia, in the near future, for good films of all makes, with American manufacturers in the lead.

During his travels, Mr. Hutchinson met Harry A. Spoor, of the Essanay; Mr. Montague, of the Selig Polyscope Co.; Mr. Smith of the Vitagraph, and Carl Laemmle, of the Imp. The latter, it is believed, was visiting London and the Continent in the interests of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co.

That European Airship Hike.

Some of the members of the Chicago office staff of the Moving Picture World are no small punks, as witness the following extract from the Journal, Henderson, Ky., of August 28th:

"Marion Gabe is home to partake of the fatted calf. Gabe is now a full fledged citizen of Chicago and can go the average Chicago man one better on breeziness or going qualities. He is now on the advertising staff of the Moving Picture World and is the 'movingest' thing in the moving picture business today. The proprietors of the magazine, since engaging the services of Gabe, are able to tour Europe in an airship, and Gabe himself works only every other Thursday, from 11 to 12. We knew it was in Gabe if they would just enter him in a fast enough class. The 'Baron' will be here only this week and social reservations should be booked early."

Our friend, Gabe, has returned to the office, and looks nothing the worse for the "prodigal's" feast nor for those early booked "social reservations" in the charming Kentucky city, noted for its fair dames and the two other requisites of a typical Kentucky burgh. Now we must take a hike in that airship, hoping we may not drop in the North River.

That Co-operative Booking Co.

Having made a frost of dramatic offerings, in their string of houses throughout the country, at admission prices ranging from $1.50 to 25 cents, the Shuberts allied themselves with other interests (or are they the only members?) to form The Co-Operative Booking Co., a corporation designed to regain some of the business which has been taken away by moving pictures.

A season of 35 weeks (in which all the principal cities are included) has been fixed for the offering of good dramatic attractions in high class theaters, at 10, 20 and 30 cents. Judging from the policy of these gentlemen in their treatment of moving pictures in such theaters, it does not look well for the life of the 35 weeks in question, should the "good attractions" at 10, 20 and 30 fail to pan out satisfactorily the first week. One thing is certain: the prices will not fluctuate, no matter how the quality of the attractions may waver.

The moving picture has taught amusement loving people a great deal. It has taught them that high class dramatic artists can be viewed in several dramas and comedies for five or ten cents, and they will naturally ask, in this case, "Why should we pay 10, 20 or 30 cents to see inferior people in only one drama or comedy?"

The moving picture invites such opposition. The new movement will make people value it more than ever, when comparison is made.

Chicago Film Brevities.

C. J. Perfitt, formerly assistant manager and press representative of the Temple theater, Grand Rapids, Mich., has been appointed local manager of the new Boston theater, North Clark St., between Madison and Washington streets, this city. The new Boston is owned by H. C. Moir, owner of the Morrison Hotel. It seats 300 people and will boast of a pipe organ which has cost $3,500. It was made by the Kimball Co., this city. A piano will be furnished in addition. Straight moving pictures of the Licensed brand, and spot light singers will form the program. The admission will be ten cents. The new Boston has been constructed with all the up-to-date safeguards, in addition to modern equipment and accessories. It will be opened Sept. 8th.

W. Isenberg, proprietor of the Grand Opera House, Greenville, Miss., paid a pleasant call at the World office on Tuesday, Sept. 3rd. Mr. Isenberg is a prominent citizen of Greenville and his house plays all the leading road attractions during the season. The remaining months of the year are devoted to straight moving pictures. Mr. Isenberg states that business has been exceptionally fine, better, indeed, than it has been for ten years, during the past six months. Greenville at first suffered from the ravages made by the overflow of the Mississippi, but it recovered rapidly and everything is booming in the pretty and well built Mississippi burgh. Mr. Isenberg states that he will remodel and decorate the Grand for the opening, next summer.

RAY C. SMALLWOOD

Ray C. Smallwood, whose likeness is shown herewith, is the cameraman who has been turning out the "Bison 101 Ranch Pictures" for the New York Motion Picture Company at Los Angeles.

Ray C. Smallwood.

He was one of the first men to run a camera for the independents in America, having been a half owner in one of the independent plants which unluckily was begun before the time was right.

During the past few years Mr. Smallwood has been associated with the Melies Company and the Imp Company, where he remained until the New York Motion Picture Company contracted with the Miller Brothers for the use of the 101 Ranch outfit. He was then sent to Los Angeles for this company, where he was assigned to the taking of all of the larger productions. Smallwood has added to his reputation as a good cameraman by the work he has done for the New York Motion Picture Company.

A few months ago, he surprised his friends by taking unto himself a wife, in the person of Ethel Grandin, the clever little leading lady in the Bison 101 Ranch pictures.

KLEINE'S CINES AND ECLIPSE FEATURES.

The inspiration of Cicero's famous oration before the Roman senate in denunciation of Catiline was the latter's conspiracy to wrest the power from Cicero and his brother consuls and to overthrow the government. The Cines Company has re-enacted the incidents and scenes, as they are supposed to have occurred, leading up to this historic event, and have attempted to portray in vivid and convincing manner with the popular Cines player, Anthony Novelli, in the role of Catiline, the tragical story of this noted conspirator's ambition to become a consul of Rome. Under the title "The Conspiracy of Catiline," the film story is to be released, Tuesday, September 10th. The scenes of the meeting of conspirators, the spying and treachery of Fulvia, the denunciation in the senate chamber, the arrest of some of the conspirators and the flight and subsequent battle of others with the soldiers, their final defeat and slaughter and the tragic death of Catiline on the field of carnage, far in advance of his slain companions, and surrounded by the great number of Roman soldiers he had killed, are quite likely to furnish thrills and hold the absorbed attention of the spectators to the very last. A short but highly interesting and beautifully tinted travelogue has been added to complete the reel, and to view the "Scenes Along the Salerno Coast of Italy," as photographed by the Cines experts with their naturally artistic ideas of picturesqueness is almost as satisfying as to visit in person the sections depicted.

If we are unable to take part ourselves and enjoy with those more fortunate, can anything be more exhilarating than to view the exciting scenes incident to coasting on toboggans down sheer inclines so steep as to almost take one's breath away merely to see them. In the Eclipse film to be released Wednesday, September 11th, this company have pictured "Winter Sports at St. Moritz, Switzerland," one of the finest and most picturesque spots in the winter time to be found in the world. With splendid photography they have caught the merry-makers coasting at a mile-a-minute speed; the crack Swiss skiers slipping lightly and skillfully down the dangerous slopes and thrilling the onlookers by spectacular leaps over the precipitous banks, and keying them to the pitch of excitment as they race on their slender skis attached to galloping horses.

On the same reel "Chemical Action" will be found a very interesting exposition of the effect of various acids and alkalis on different substances as viewed under a powerful microscope.

Another splendid feature of this unusual educational reel are the "Glimpses of St. Petersburg" which have been added. The highly picturesque capital city of the Great Russian Empire is shown in a beautiful panorama, as well as close views of many important points of interest, including the quaint people and their dress.

The Cines release of Saturday, September 14th, "Honors Divided" gives Alfred Bracci a fine opportunity to show in more serious work than the comedies he has played in of late. A touching love story of faithful devotion is related with dramatic intensity and in consistent form. When the young author and playwright is taken ill while working on his play it begins to look as though he would be unable ever to finish it. How the pretty daughter of his landlady steps into the breach and helps him to fame and fortune forms one of the prettiest romances that has been filmed in some time.

MANDELBAUM RETIRING FROM EXHIBITION BUSINESS.

A deal involving three high-class moving picture theaters in Cleveland, Ohio, valued at considerable over $100,000, was completed August 31, whereby E. Mandelbaum, president of the Atlas Amusement Company, retires from that concern.

Mr. Mandelbaum has sold his holdings in the company to Messrs. A. Newman, and A. L. Freedman, treasurer and secretary, respectively of the Atlas. The new Knickerbocker playhouse, on Euclid Avenue at E. 83rd Street; the Lakewood, in Lakewood, a suburb, and the Market Square in Newburg, are the theaters which are affected. Messrs. Newman and Freedman will continue the present policy of the theaters which has made them quite successful.

Mr. Mandelbaum leaves the concern to devote all of his attention to the interests of the Lake Shore Film & Supply Company and the F. & E. Film Company of Cleveland, of which concerns he is manager. He has controlled ten theaters in Cleveland and is gradually reliquishing his connections with them in order to devote all his time to the film enterprises.

NEW FEATURES.

The Feature Film Co., 108 East 12th St., New York City, is one of the exchanges conducting a rental department for exclusive feature programs, and is supplying service throughout the New England and Southern States. The Feature Film Company has been busy during the warm weather, making purchases of domestic and foreign features, and is now well equipped to handle the volume of business it is looking forward to.

Having an unlimited field for operation, and the benefit of two years' experience in this field, with a resident buyer on the Continent selecting the best pictures the European market affords, this company, through the honest business method it employs, bids fair to enjoy a goodly proportion of the feature rentals, regardless of the strong competition in the field.

THE SCREEN CLUB.

Plans are under way to organize a club composed of men interested in the motion picture industry, possibly on lines similar to those of The Friars. It has been suggested in the tentative steps, that directors, actors and those connected with the photoplay press be eligible for membership. The subject will be discussed at the photoplaywrights' dinner at Coney Island on Saturday evening. One point has been definitely settled—the new organization will be known as the Screen Club.

Pathe Western Producer Builds New Plant—Tally Back in Los Angeles—Notes.

A WAVE of the prosperity that has been causing many of the motion picture manufacturers in this vicinity to spend large sums of money in improving and enlarging their plants has now struck the Pathe Western company. James Young Deer, manager and director of the Southern California Pathe interests has just purchased 35 acres of land on "Donegan's Hill," a high eminence overlooking Edendale, and will build on it at once a big modern motion picture plant. The Edendale plant on Alessandro Street, which is no longer large enough for the company's needs, will probably be abandoned within a few months.

Mr. Young Deer's plans, so far as he has divulged them, are elaborate. He intends to have a small town of his own on the hill, with an inclined railroad connecting with the street car system, and a great amount of landscape and architectural embellishment.

The Pathe Western company has been working at a big ranch in Orange County the greater part of the summer, but has now come back to Edendale, where the making of a number of interior scenes will occupy it for a couple of weeks. After that the members will go to Catalina, where an idyllic drama is to be produced with Princess Redwing and George Gebhardt in the leading parts.

There will be no more expeditions away from Los Angeles after that for a long time, because Mr. Young Deer wants to be on the ground to superintend the construction of the new studio.

Gov. Johnson Pictured.

The visit of Governor Hiram Johnson to Los Angeles August 26, when he made his last speech in his home state before starting on a stumping tour of the Middle West and the Eastern states as Progressive candidate for vice-president, was taken advantage of by George Melford, director of the Kalem Glendale company. The Governor visited the Los Angeles Athletic Club at noon, where he was the guest of honor at a banquet of newspaper editors of Southern California. Melford has been making a sociological drama dealing with women suffrage, and one of the big scenes is that in which the heroine, after many rebuffs from subordinates, finally lies in wait for the Governor as he arrives to attend a public reception and catches his ear and his sympathy. Melford had his leading woman in readiness and a camera stationed at the entrance to the club. The Governor did not know the purpose of the picture until he was in front of the camera. Then it was explained to him in the conversation which was supposed to be an appeal for help for the cause. He entered into the spirit of the thing and the result was nearly 200 feet of film which could not have been improved upon, and that will show how well camera-broken Governor Johnson is.

Tally Comes Back.

The return of T. L. Tally to Los Angeles unexpectedly and his reappearance in the role of manager of the Tally-Kinemacolor-Colonial Theater furnished a surprise for local exhibitors this week. Tally established and operated the Tally Theater on Broadway. When the Kinemacolor Company came seeking a location he sub-leased the building, on which he had a fifty-year lease, for a short time, and went to San Francisco. Recently the Kinemacolor Company turned its lease over to the Quinn Brothers, owners of the Banner and Garrick theaters, and they changed the name of the theater to the Colonial and have been operating it since. Meanwhile, they announced, they had purchased Tally's 50-year lease, which still has more than 40 years to run, and made plans to build a fourteen-story hotel and theater on the site, which is one of the most valuable in Los Angeles. The sub-lease, which they took over from the Kinemacolor Company, does not expire until December 1, and that is about the time when they expect to be ready to begin building operations. There were some defects in this lease which made it possible for both parties to withdraw from it, and, when it was cancelled a few days ago, Tally found himself with the house on his hands to run until December 1, when the Quinn Brothers will take repossession under the original lease. It is a complicated transaction and I hope I have made it as clear as the Quinn Brothers tried to make it to me.

Brevities.

In self defense, the management of the Los Angeles Municipal News, the newspaper owned and published by the municipality of Los Angeles, has been compelled to request me to notify readers of the Moving Picture World that there are no more copies available of the recent edition of the paper containing an article by the musical critic on "Music in Motion Picture Theaters." I spoke of the article in brief and advised exhibitors who are studying their business to send for a copy of the edition containing it. Since then requests from motion picture exhibitors all over the United States—and some from abroad—have made up the bulk of the newspaper's mail, with the result that the edition has been exhausted. To notify the late comers to this effect is imposing more of a burden on the management than I intended, and so I cheerfully comply with the request to "call off the readers of the World." The episode, however, may convey a hint to advertisers.

The Alaska-Siberia motion pictures taken by the Carnegie expedition, after a run of four weeks at the Mason Opera House, where they broke all previous records for motion picture runs in this city, are coming back for a return engagement of two weeks more. They are to open September 2nd. When the pictures closed, business had been improving every week and the prospects were that the fifth week would have been larger than any of the rest. A previous booking which could not be cancelled brought the run to an enforced close, but a rearrangement of other dates made the return engagement possible.

Clune's third and nearest downtown motion picture theater opened August 31 with Licensed programs and features. The theater is the old Grand Opera House at First and Main streets, once the finest house in Los Angeles. In late years it has lost much of its prestige, so that it became a home for melodramatic melodrama and cheap musical comedy and burlesque. Clune has spent a great deal of money in refurnishing and decorating it and its location, combined with what the Clune management usually implies, should make it pay.

Despite the fact that several new exchanges have opened in this city in the last month, Manager Dawes, of Miles Bros.' exchange, says that business is constantly increasing and that several new houses have come in within the last two weeks. His optimism is corroborated by the fact that a force of carpenters and other mechanics are now engaged in making extensive alterations to the building which the exchange occupies at 411 West Eighth Street. When they are finished the concern will have increased its floor space about fifty per cent.

Mack Sennet, director, and Mabel Normand, leading woman, of the Keystone company of the New York Motion Picture Company, arrived in Los Angeles August 28 as the advance guard of a new company which is to be located in the old Bison plant at Edendale. Both were formerly with the Biograph Company, and others from the same company are said to be coming later. The Keystone brand of films, according to report, are to be produced from Los Angeles hereafter.

WINSTOCK REPUDIATES HIS OWN LETTER.

Early in August there was received at this office a communication from Mr. Melvin G. Winstock, of Portland, Ore., which was used as the basis of an article entitled "Branching Out," the same appearing in our issue of August 10. The statements in the article are substantially as furnished by Mr. Winstock. In the light of his first communication, it is deemed fitting to publish the two following letters, recently received, and let the reader draw his own conclusions:

To the Editor of the World:

In your issue of August 10th, page 544, there is an article which contains information not entirely correct, and I ask for sufficient space for publication of the facts.

The Peoples Amusement Company has started neither an Exchange nor a Laboratory. Portland capitalists, separate and apart from the Peoples Amusement Co., are operating a corporation known as "The Film Supply Company of Oregon."

The proposed factory for the manufacture of films is in no sense of the word connected with the Peoples Amusement Co., but is a distinct venture entirely separate and apart from the Peoples. The Peoples has a contract with a camera man who takes local events.

The fact that the Peoples Amusement Co. changed its service at the same time that the Film Supply Co.'s exchange started in business unquestionably led your correspondent into the pardonable error. I am sure, however, that the Motion Picture World desires to print nothing but the facts. Therefore, I ask for space in which to set forth the situation as it is. Thanking you in advance, and wishing you success, I am, Yours very truly,

MELVIN G. WINSTOCK, Manager.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: I wish to call your attention to an article in your issue of Aug. 10th, under the heading "Branching Out." The Peoples Amusement Co. organizing an Exchange and Laboratory" on page 544. This information was either incorrect or misinterpreted. The Film Supply Co. of Oregon is NOT owned by the Peoples Amusement Company, or operated by that concern. The Film Supply Co. of Oregon is a corporation and is owned by stockholders who are interested in both companies, and I further wish to state that Mr. M. G. Winstock has no connection with the management of the Film Supply Co. of Oregon, further than being a stockholder of said corporation. I wish you would kindly have this article corrected and oblige. Yours very truly,

FILM SUPPLY COMPANY OF OREGON.

The Moving Picture Educator

THE EDUCATIONAL INFLUENCE OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

THE Second National Convention of Moving Picture Exhibitors raises both themselves and their work to a position of honor and dignity. The star of cinematography is most certainly in the ascendant. Many things took place in that convention which ought to be more widely known than through either the medium of its reports, or even the trade papers. Without doubt the echo of an elevating progress resounds throughout the whole moving picture world.

While this paper has always treated the exhibitor as a man with large educative opportunities and responsibilities, it remained for the Hon. John J. Lentz to so timely point out that the exhibitor had power to "educate the boyhood and girlhood, the manhood and womanhood of the United States to a higher state of intelligence and efficiency." The claim for the pictures that they must "uplift humanity" is also an opportune one, and as it is commonly understood that the after results of a convention are supposed to be energy, ambition and enterprise in a certain direction, it can but be assured that both producers and exhibitors of moving pictures will find themselves walking upon a higher level than was their position before the convention was held. A welcome must also be accorded the reference to the possible religious advantage of the pictures; this causes one to notice that the commercial or mercenary side of the moving picture business was not a predominating theme; the greatest good of and for the pictures with the greatest good for the people was the evident theme.

The claim for the pictures as made by President Neff that "the moving picture is the cornerstone of education and civilization" is certainly a great one, and one which will assuredly not be disputed here where the educative qualities of cinematography are always advocated. It is gratifying to have such high ideals and emphatic statements declared in the convention and with such authority. Thus it will be seen that the whole tone at Chicago was of the highest order, and that the educational aspects were more emphasized than the amusing and pleasure-giving, which retained their place in the proportionate relationship.

The very timely and popular introduction of the work of the late J. P. Chalmers was a meritorious and just action, and it is to the credit of the convention that they did not forget to ascribe honor to whom honor was due, giving the late editor a just tribute and reward for his labors, besides testifying to the fact that though he be dead, the greatest good of the moving picture for which he labored is pre-eminently successful. The Educator congratulates those responsible for the convention for its notable work, and assures them that the educational influences of that convention will be great and far-reaching; more good has been done than was anticipated and they have crowned themselves with honor.

THE PROBLEM OF THE TIMES.

An Answer.

THE educational world is aroused by a question being asked everywhere where progress is of interest in all parts of the United States: "Are the Public Schools a Failure?" The Ladies Home Journal has undertaken to discuss the matter by asking the highest authorities to give their views and experiences relative thereto. The burden of the argument is sadly against the standing of the school.

There is nothing of which America is prouder than its schools and educational privileges—"a school house in every village" and "a flag on every school house" resulting in "an education for every child." To be compelled to admit that the country's great educational system is a failure is a lamentable confession. It should be understood, however, that the failure is not in any way suggestive or an educational lack entirely, but rather that the standards, co-equal to the preparations and costs made for certain results, are not realized. Certain pedagogical tests have been made which betrayed the weakness which exists. For instance, forty teachers were given a list of names of a number of famous people living and dead; the whole forty were correct in their knowledge of Queen Elizabeth; only eight knew of Pythias, showing thirty-two in ignorance; while of Jane Addams twenty-three were correct, and seventeen wrong.

In a smaller degree and in his own little way, the writer makes it a rule to ask all teachers he may meet concerning cinematography, and at the present writing has not met one teacher, below the grade of principal, able to answer correctly. It was shown on this page recently that a certain teacher found her scholars more proficient in moving picture affairs than herself.

These proofs are revelations of the fact, that the majority of our teachers move in very small circles and along very narrow lines. The stupendous nature of this subject takes it beyond the scope of any particular set of authorities, or the limitations of any magazine; it is possible, however, to suggest conditions tending to improvement.

There is an old saying founded upon historical occurences, "that the darkest days presage the coming of the prophet of light." There is an appropriate application of this saying at this time. Who can tell but that the light of the cinematograph may be the timely arrival upon the dark issues of the unsatisfactory educational results of to-day.

It is generally admitted that the moving picture is the greatest educator of the age, why not then raise the issue: The Cinematograph in every School, with education by the moving picture as one of the solutions of the problem now embarrassing so many. It is a noble sentiment which secures a school in every community; it is patriotic to put the flag on every school; surely then it will be of the highest educational value to secure all the full, explicit, rapid and thorough educative properties claimed for cinematography, by advocating the system whereby those results may surely be obtained.

There is nothing experimental about the project, it has been tried, proved and found, not only successful as filling required conditions, but possessed of unlimited possibilities far beyond the requirements, or of the capabilities of the times; as a matter of fact its powers are at the present time greater than its demands.

Is it possible that "the blazing of the way" to this great advance, the preparations for the solution of the question "How to make our Schools efficient" belongs to the Moving Picture World and Educator? Whether this be so or not, the future will show that when the pages of this paper are scanned, it will be found that they were ever in the front for the highest and broadest possibilities of the moving picture in aid the educational advancement of the youth, of not only the United States but of the whole world.

ESSANAY PLAYERS FAVORABLY MENTIONED.

Misses Ruth Stonehouse, Evebelle Prout and Beverley Bayne recently appeared in a society circus given at the Arcadia Amusement Palace, Chicago, under the auspices of a society of North Side women with great credit to themselves. The young ladies are accomplished dancers and their efforts received most favorable mention in the Chicago papers. Especially fine was Miss Stonehouse's poetic interpretation of Mendellsohn's "Spring Song." Miss Stonehouse is also a great favorite in her home town, Victor, Colo., where her father, a mining expert, resides.

HERE'S THAT "EXHIBITORS" PICTURE.

On Thursday, September 19th, the Selig Polyscope Co. will release the picture in which will appear the "pit" scene in which some five or six hundred of the exhibitors who visited the Selig plant during the Chicago Convention took part. The "pit" scene was a strenuous one, for the exhibitors worked with all the energy that they possessed. The title of the picture is "Into the Genuine."

The Selig Company also announces that the picture showing the exhibitors and their friends entering the Selig plant can be obtained from the General Film Exchanges.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

WHOEVER said "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown," or words to that effect, failed to make any impression upon Maurice Costello, the Vitagraph player, for he is a full-fledged candidate for election to the office of King of the Coney Island Mardi Gras.

If the feminine residents of Greater New York and vicinity have been sincere in the expression of their sentiments regarding Mr. Costello, and are still loyal to him, he should be very close to the top in the betting list. The dear girls who write "I am dying to see him as he is out of the pictures," now have a chance to prolong their lives and give their favorite a chance to realize how it feels to be a king for a week. "I don't know who put that over on me," said Mr. Costello last Saturday. "The first intimation I had of it was when the announcement was made in a newspaper that I was a candidate. As the nomination is official, and many of my friends have personally endorsed it, I have decided to accept the honor. If elected, I promise to make my reign second to none of the best of my predecessors from a standpoint commanding approbation. Should I ascend the throne, it will be my privilege to enjoy the many pleasant features of royal life that do not attend it as depicted in the photoplays. How gratifying it will be to know that the multitude assembled to pay homage to His Majesty—ahem!—are not there because they have been hired at so much per head to shout 'Long live the Kink!' For the time being it will be a chapter from real life—real—er—er—real—yes, everything will be on the level, you know. And just think of it? When the Court is in festive session there will be real, honest to goodness, cross your heart wine! It will be so different from my experiences in royal life before the camera. Just say, please, that while I am not a Prohibitionist, I shall have a string attached to that wine proposition, because I do not anticipate the tithes of the kingdom will be adequate to corner the fizz water market. Yes, that is what I mean. I don't want anybody to be disappointed if I do not give the command 'Bring forth the royal bumper!' every time somebody shouts, 'Hello, Kink Kos!'"

The voting for King of the Mardi Gras will not be as heavy this year as it has been in the past, for the reason that it is to continue but two weeks, so that the total vote cast will be no criterion as to the actual popularity of the respective candidates. In previous years the balloting started several weeks ahead of the Mardi Gras. Up to the latter part of last week it looked as if the event would go by default on account of the hesitancy of certain parties who always contributed substantially to the expense fund to loosen their purse strings. They let go at the eleventh hour and the big event opens on September 9th.

By the way, in giving notice that he will not flood Coney Island with wine in case of his election as its 1912 King, Costello shows better foresight than many candidates for office usually display. He is taking no chances of being confronted with charges of failure to carry out pre-election promises.

A few days ago several officers of the Argentine navy were entertained at the laboratoriés of Thomas A. Edison at Orange, N. J. The event would hardly be material to these columns but for the fact that the inventor incidentally gave a demonstration of his new talking pictures and is credited with the statement that they will be generally exhibited within the next few months.

The announcement was accepted with interest by the amusement public, but among people who are in touch with the making of moving picture films it occasioned an interest so keen that in some circles it extended almost to the border of apprehension. This was particularly noticeable among many of the photoplayers. The statement that Mr. Edison "has finally perfected the talking moving picture" and "the visitors were delighted with the adjustment of voices and action" caused them to begin speculating as to what the future demands will be upon them.

The players I have heard discussing the matter assume that to attain perfect synchronism the voices and action of the players must be taken simultaneously. That is what has put some of them on the anxious bench. In such an event they must go back to the lines. There are many people in the business today who are making more than good in the photoplays so far as action is concerned, but who, on account of physical infirmities and other reasons, would probably fail to make good if obliged to give the lines for reproduction. So, since the news has come from Orange, many of the players are anxiously awaiting more news. They would like more details as to the stunt and are interested in knowing if it is to be adopted by the studios generally, and, if so, what part the players are to perform in its operation.

The most complacent of those who discussed the matter was an actor who has quite frequently been assigned parts of an almost impossible character, such as scaling up standpipes, masts of ships, parts of buildings in course of construction, and performing similar feats in places where it would seem only possible to make space for the actor alone. Said he, "I know that if I lived long enough I would have a chance to get back at some of the ground-floor leading men who have looked upon me with a patronizing air and have been telling me that as a steeplejack I was a credit to the profession. Some of them have gone so far as to tell me that some of my stunts made me a striking exemplification of the Darwin theory—making a monkey of me, as it were. Now, when Mr. Edison comes along with his eye-opener, these fellows will have lines to study, and when they are spouting their parts I can sit on my lofty perch with the satisfaction of knowing there is no room for the machine that catches the voices, and I have no lines to study." He was shaking hands with himself most cordially when one of the profession to whom his remarks were directed said, "You are all right, Bill, so far as you go, but Mr. Edison has told me that he has prepared for such contingencies as may arise in your sphere. I believe that when you are perched on your little treetop you will have attached to you a little instrument connected with the synchronizer below that will take all you are expected to give it."

Said another of the group, "All this is more or less groundless anticipation. If the invention has been perfected and comes into general use, it will develop features of far greater importance than you have considered. It will revolutionize the manufacture of films in many respects. It will entail a big increase of both labor and expense on the part of the manufacturers which will, no doubt, necessitate an increase in the selling and rental prices. In addition to the expenditures that may be required for the record of voices, there will be a mass of extra detail in connection with the manuscripts. Extemporaneous lines will not work as they do nowadays, and it will be necessary to supply each player with the proper material. Some players go into two or more scenes in as many different subjects in a day and the preparation of the parts for the advance work that is now done by studios will be a great task. The revolution of operations in the scenario departments will be almost stupendous. The cry now is for "ideas." The cry then will be for ideas and lines, and when the writers cannot furnish the latter the studio will require playwriters to furnish them, which will also tend to add to the general increase in the cost of production. It will be a good opportunity for a host of playwriters who have been anxious to break into the photoplay field.

"If it is to be understood that the Edison invention is to be used generally by the manufacturers," continued the speaker, "then you need not look for the event during the coming winter. The public must first pass upon the new talking pictures. If they are a success and a demand is created for them, then the change will begin. It will be a gradual change. Companies producing several subjects a week will require considerable time to get their entire output into line."

NUGENT BROTHERS ENLARGING THEATER.

Nugent Brothers' five-cent moving picture theater in Lowe Street, South Kakauna, Wis., is being enlarged. The rear, or east end, of the building is being extended about twenty feet. The ceiling will be raised four feet, ovaled up from the sides and covered with pressed steel of pretty design. The operating booth will be moved forward about eighteen feet so there will be practically no change in the length of throw. The space thus vacated in the northwest corner will be converted into a waiting room or toilet room for ladies. The alterations will increase the seating capacity by about eighty seats, and it will also improve the ventilation.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Getting Program Ads.

HERE'S a letter from Ezra Rhodes, of the Surprise Theater, South Bend, Indiana, in reply to a recent comment in which we spoke of the lack of outside advertising in the program and expressed the belief that much could be had. In answer Mr. Rhodes writes:

> In the matter of outside advertising, we do believe in the same and would be only too glad to run same at reasonable rates, but try as we may, so far in our twin city of more than 75,990 population, we have not been able to interest the merchants in the value of our medium. Perhaps you can tell us how it can be done. Possibly you will advise a special solicitor, but where may such a man be had?
> Last spring we went after three hundred possible advertisers with a dummy and with eight different form letters, sent one day apart. This was followed up with personal calls. The result was practically nothing.
> We try to reach every home once a week. We think it pays us. We think it would pay the general advertiser. Your suggestions will be appreciated.

In the First Place.

In the first place we think that Mr. Rhodes made a mistake in querying with a dummy and in the second we do not like his advertising campaign. The letters are clever in a certain sense, but they read as though they had been written by an advertising expert who did not have the proper enthusiasm. The letters are more or less cold appeals. They make statements but they offer no real argument. We take it that many more than Mr. Rhodes are interested in this proposition, and we are going to discuss the matter in detail. If you have no program at present save this issue against the time you do.

We gather that the letters Mr. Rhodes sends were sent in the order in which they come to us. All of them are addressed "Mr. Advertiser" and are signed in typewriting. It is purely and simply a form letter with no suggestion of personal appeal whatever, and being sent every second day, the second comes in before the first is digested, and so until the eighth creates a sort of mental dyspepsia.

There are concerns which make a specialty of preparing these follow-up letters, and this set looks as though they had been obtained from one of these companies. In a way the letters seem clever, but there is an utter absence of the personal touch as well as real argument. The first letter was accompanied by a dummy made up of four impressions of the same eight page form and a cover. This was the first mistake. Most of those who will come into a program are not familiar with dummy forms. The repetition of the same matter four times unconsciously predjudices the reader, and it most assuredly does not give a hint of what the booklet will be like. It is incomplete. It does not affect the reader favorably. If you can't get him interested in the book you can't expect him to suppose that others will be more interested than he.

The Letters.

With this dummy went the first of the circular letters. It is printed on the letterhead of the Surprise, but for all the suggestion of a personal appeal it might as well have been run in job instead of typewriter type for all the suggestion of intimacy it conveys. There is a date line but no date, there is no superscription and no subscription. It is addressed to no one and is signed by no one. It is a circular and might better have been put into circular form.

The only real value of typewriter type is when the type matches the face of the machine used by the advertiser and the typist fills in the name of the person addressed so carefully that it has every appearance of a personal communication.

To do this the letter must be printed with silk over the type and the typewriter must match the ink used. Where the run is but three hundred, one of the small duplicating devices could have been used to better effect. We do not favor form letters, but where they are used they should be done with the utmost care, else they are worse than useless.

The first letter reads:

> We inclose a sample dummy of proposed issue of our weekly magazine and program.
> Will you kindly look this over? We believe that it would prove the best advertising medium in the city.
> We have now put out our present issue for five months at a cost to us of about $2,000.00. We are satisfied that it has paid us. The new complete issue and circulation will pay better. It will pay you to use its pages. Will you kindly look the proposition over?

Lacks the Punch.

The letter lacks punch. It tells that a dummy is sent. It tells that $2,000 has been spent (which doesn't interest the prospective advertiser) and it asks that the proposition be looked over. The second letter is a little better. It runs:

> Mr. Advertiser:
> In advertising, what is worth doing at all is worth doing right and complete. Is this not true?
> How can you reach every family in South Bend, Mishawaka, and River Park, and have a receipt from the United States Government that you do? By one way only;—the United States mail. The cost at one cent per piece is $125.00 alone, to say nothing of the printing and labor.
> Will you join us in this proposition? Drop us a line.

There is more argument here. The two letters combined might have made one good letter, but why should the advertiser drop a line? Better results would have followed "Send in the enclosed postal and let our representative go into details with you. He will be brief." Mark the card so the sender will be known and men will drop the postal in the mail basket where they would not take the trouble to write a letter.

Keeping It Up.

The third letter merely states that instead of trusting to the city directory the addresses will be verified by personal inquiry, guaranteeing 99% delivery. This is a good point for the general advertiser, but it does not interest the man who is being tempted to make his first adventure in advertising. He doesn't realize that a mailing list may not be 70% correct. Yet it is the small man, the man who cannot afford the daily paper who comes into the locality program.

Next the argument is advanced that the writer believes that an advertisement in the program stands a better chance of being read than one in any other medium. He doesn't tell why. He just says he thinks so. He adds that his publication interests 50% of the population and that the advertising stays alive for seven times as long as a daily paper. The prospect is not told that the reason for this is that it covers the bill for a week and so is of daily interest during that week. Percentages are beginning to confuse him. He has been told he will reach 99% of the circulation. He has been told that the whole city has been covered. Now he is advised that but half of these copies will be read with interest. He gets only 49½ per cent. He is getting his thoughts jolted and then the argument winds up; "Are we correct? If we are, considering that we reach every one, our medium must have value."

And Still Some More.

The next letter tells that while advertising reaches the better class there are many families unable to take a daily paper who still must purchase food and clothing, and that this class will be the most attentive readers of the program because they will read it in lieu of the missing daily paper "while a family with a lot of reading matter will not even look at the advertising pages of their daily paper," whatever that may mean. The impression that it is sought to create seems to be that the families well supplied with publications will not read the advertising in the papers, but why then should they read the advertising in the program? It's because the smaller allotment of advertising space makes the advertising stand out so that it must be read. This explanation should have been given, but it is left to the imagination.

In the next attack the suggestion is made that the rates ($15 a four by six page, page rates up to $24 a page for one-twelfth pages), are high, but not so high as the cost of 12,500 postal cards. The letter runs on "Our rates, with all available space sold, will not begin to cover the cost of issue to us, but that will help some, which help it is necessary to have as the proposition is too big for a 5-cent picture show to carry." Meantime the offer is made to accept half rates on a circulation of 8,000, of which 6,000 will be delivered with the Sunday papers, presumably folded in, whereon the advertiser argues that the house that gets two papers gets two copies of the program. Incidentally he wonders what has become of the proposition to mail from that mailing list that is 99 per cent. correct.

After Which.

After this comes a letter advancing the argument that with the doubling the size of the booklet the reading matter will be doubled, making the issue doubly attractive, equaling the ten and fifteen cent magazines.

Last of all comes the valedictory which runs:

> Mr. Advertiser:
> We have sent you a number of circular letters, and we hope not all in vain, and for fear that you have misplaced the dummy, first sent you, we enclose another.
> We shall appreciate it if you will advise whether our present issue, or the proposed one appeals to you, and if you cannot use space in same.
> We believe you must say YES. Anyway kindly let us hear from you.

Once more the busy advertiser is asked to write a letter, because he has not written one before. There is expressed a doubt as to whether or not the increase in size is advisable. There is no note of confident optimism. Just the vague wonder which the advertiser will like best.

That's no way to go at a man. Tell him breezily, but not blatantly that of course he realizes that a double sized magazine is more than twice as good because it looks more than twice as big. Then he'll believe it because you do.

The Better Way.

Follow up campaigns are all right for large general advertisers, but we think that in most towns the personal approach is better and that the gradual growth is better than the splurge.

If we had a house we would try to see the people ourselves. We would drop in on the druggist nearest the theater and suggest that we were going to put out a four-page weekly program, just a hint of what pictures are coming to keep the interest up. We would point out how the people are all picture fans. We would be willing to gamble that an intelligent circulation would greatly increase business and we would offer to let him in on a good thing. We would not assume that we were doing him a favor. We would take it for granted that he would figure that he could get the soda business and sundries, and perhaps some prescription trade, too. The advertising would not cost $15 a page, because it would be for a small issue, but we would have the man in line for better things as the issue grew.

If the druggist didn't want it perhaps our grocer or the clothing store or the locality department store would come in. If we got very badly stuck we would pick out some leading merchant and give him a free advertisement as a bait for others.

But before we talked to anyone, we would get ourselves so confident of success that it would simply ooze out of us. We would talk with the ring of sincerity because we would be sincere. We would be modest, yet assured, and we would communicate our faith to the men we talked to.

Keep Away from the Big Ones.

We would not go to the big advertisers; the men who can take a half page in the daily papers. We would talk real figures to the man we talked with on the proposition that we could not afford to be caught in a lie—not very much of a lie, anyhow—and our chat of 5,000 would not interest the man who pays a dollar a line per hundred thousand circulation. We couldn't do him much good and he would do us no good, so we would keep away from and seek to interest the man in the next block or across the street. He is the man who can appreciate what we can do for him. As the issue grew and the circulation spread we would follow the circulation. We would prove that we sent subscriptions several blocks away from a place of business and we would likely get the advertisement of the place, but we would have our mailing list and post office receipts or other good evidence to show.

We would do this work ourselves if it was at all possible, and in any event we would make it possible until we had three or four cards. It does not pay to maintain a solicitor, since his salary would cut too large a slice out of the profits, but if we had a smart young man about the place we would pay him a commission on the advertising he could bring in and let him have the spare time to do it in.

It would take a little coaxing to raise the rates when that became necessary, but when we did we would first show what we gave for the increased price.

Mailing Lists.

We would try and have a mailing list. If we had sixteen or more pages we would send the issue to all who would deposit the postage. The real fans would gladly do this and the scheme helps in keeping the list right up to the minute. We would get a permit to mail the matter unstamped, by paying for it in multiples of one hundred pieces, and if we told an advertiser that that we have 3,000 mail circulation we would be ready to show we had paid $30 to the post office for that many pieces. If we distributed largely through the box office we would show printing receipts. If we used the house to house system of distribution—which is not a good scheme for weekly programs—we would let any advertiser accompany our distributor. We would give what we promised and promise no more than we could give.

Writing Letters.

If we did circularize by letter we would put a punch into every line. We would catch the reader's eye and we would hold him with argument. We would write something like this:

> We are circulating about five thousand copies of our weekly program within a radius of ten blocks from your store. Do you want to share with us, at a most moderate price, advertising that stays alive a whole week and is replaced by advertising just as vital? We'll take a few advertisements for the program and put them where they will be seen. We'll do it for a price that wouldn't buy an inch in the daily papers. A daily paper covers the entire city. Every copy we send out stays right in the vicinity of your business. You pay only for what you get. Let's talk it over with you. Tell us when to come and we'll be there. Just mark day and hour on the enclosed postal. You can't afford the cost of newspaper advertising, but you can't afford not to place your ad. with us.

Following this up we might write a week later.

> You haven't told us to come and talk advertising to you, so we suppose you are still thinking it over. Every week you stay out is costing you money—and it's costing us money. Make an appointment. Let us give you a few brief figures and back them up with facts.

If that didn't bring him into the fold we would make a last try something like this:

> We don't want to be a nuisance, and we won't be, but you haven't told us when we can tell you about that 5,000 circulation within half a mile of your store. You don't have to advertise, but don't you think it is worth talking it over? We are at your service any time.

If that didn't land him we would figure out that he didn't want to see us and we would concentrate on the more enterprising, but for a small business we would use actual typewriting and we would sign the letters with a pen if we contracted writer's cramp.

Summing It Up.

There's just one way to get the advertising. Believe in your proposition and then make the other fellow share your belief. Talk straight from the shoulder and talk straight. Do not promise ten thousand when you know you have but half that number printed. Perhaps the advertiser knows the man who does the work for you. If there is a shop in the neighborhood that can turn out the work, deal there if it does cost a dollar or so more. Then you can refer to the printer and get the money back.

Ten minutes' talk of the right sort is worth ten hundred letters, but if you must write, write as you talk.

Start small and grow big. Try to start too big and you'll feel small. Begin on the men you know and increase your field as your program builds up. Don't tell a man you are going to have the best program that ever was printed and that next year you are going to have a colored cover. Show him what you have to sell right now. That's what he is buying. Only stock brokers and fortune tellers deal in futures. You stay with the present.

All of this is not applicable to the Surprise, but some of it is applicable to any house. Make a note of it.

Booming a Peril.

The Princess Theater, Provo, Utah, used a half-page in the daily paper to advertise the coming of "A Nation's Peril" and uses in addition the story of the film as fictionized in the Motion Picture Story Magazine. It is a stroke of enterprise that is marred only by the fact that no credit is given the magazine for the story. Courtesy, if not copyright caution, should suggest the use of a credit line, the more particularly as this use would give dignity to the story. We do not anticipate that Mr. Brewster will offer any decided objection to the omission, but since all stories in the magazine are protected by copyright it would be well to use the credit line.

The advertisement is well displayed and fills the space without crowding. Even in a small town a half-page is an expense, but with a feature to justify the outlay the money will come back to the house with generous interest, if not on that particular reel in the general betterment of business. Taken in connection with the story, the film takes more than a page of a four-page issue and refuses to be overlooked.

Edison Features.

The advance Edison releases give some good talking points. Make a note of these against the coming of the film.

"The Governor" (September 17th), is a timely political story dealing with a state election and the defeat of the bosses by a newly inaugurated executive.

"Hearts and Diamonds" (September 20th). A smuggling story in which the Revenue Cutter Service figures. Remember that this is the Treasury Department Navy, not a branch of the Navy Department.

"Mary in Stageland" (September 27th). The third of the "What Happened to Mary" series.

"Ostler Joe" (September 28th). This is the poem by George R. Sims, the author of "Lights o' London," and other melodramas that will be remembered by the old timers. Incidentally the fact that the recital of this poem put Mrs. James Brown Potter into the theatrical business may be recalled. She married a relative of Bishop Potter, of New York, and her recital was regarded as shocking because of that fact, though the poem is harmless enough. Have some local reader recite the poem, and boom that fact. You may find it in the library under its proper title of "The Modern Phryne."

All of these are good for a little extra noise, particularly the Mary series.

WHAT EVERY EXHIBITOR KNOWS.

To the Editor of the Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—As an exhibitor who is endeavoring in every possible and legitimate way to raise the standard of the Photoplay, I would like to voice my sentiments regarding certain failings of some manufacturers to meet the approval of the better element of patrons.

First, in my opinion and in the opinion of refined patrons, there is an undue percentage of sickening love scenes introduced in many dramas that is almost disgusting; not only that, but many scenes of osculation are overdone and border so much on the portrayal of passion in its animal sense as to spoil oftimes an otherwise splendid production. What the intelligent audience of to-day demands is clean and wholesome films, free from the least suggestiveness, whether the film be tragedy, drama, or comedy.

I am sorry to state that in one week we were obliged to cut out nine different scenes from our service, which if shown, would have had a bad effect upon the class of audiences to which we cater and the steady patronage of which we enjoy. We are not prudish in this censorship, but the demoralizing effect of many scenes is often glaring, though easily remedied.

But last week we found ourselves in a position where we either had to leave a film off the programme or be forced to advertise a 5c. periodical issued monthly. We have for several years made it a firm rule to advertise nothing on our screen, either with slides or otherwise, except coming features in connection with the house, and possibly for this reason the arrival of this film in question aroused our inner selves to protest. No doubt the manufacturer was paid a neat sum for producing the picture and to follow the story as the installments of the story are published each month in this periodical, but I think that it is going a step too far for the manufacturer to force the exhibitor to advertise upon his screen, not only that the story was appearing in a magazine but to flash the cover design of that magazine.

Naturally we made the most of our position and offered a six-months' pass to anyone coming nearest to the solution of the plot. We would like to hear from other exhibitors in our class on this vital subject. In my opinion, such procedure on the part of the manufacturers should be nipped in the bud, before it becomes a licensed nuisance.

Very respectfully yours,

H. G. LUX, JR.,
Mgr. Alhambra Theater, Utica, N. Y.

BUILDING UP THE TOWN.

A number of artistic bungalows erected at Niles, Cal., near the western studio of the Essanay Company have added materially to the residential beauty and importance of that town. These little homes are occupied by the members of the Essanay players.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

No Scripts to Loan.

LAST week we published a letter sent by an advice grafter to one of the prize winners of the recent Powers contest. Since then we have received two other letters, the first from James Carroll, winner of the first prize, who writes:

> Since winning the Powers contest I have received many letters from aspiring writers asking advice and requesting instruction. Not feeling qualified to instruct and not having time to do so, I have written to each of these inquirers that no instruction is necessary (I never had any, evolving my own ideas into my own form of photoplay as I went ahead) save the original idea and the ability to work it into proper form. This, I informed them, could be readily obtained by a careful study of Technique of the Photoplay, which I gladly recommended, as I consider it the best treatise obtainable.

From the second prize winner, R. D. Armstrong, comes this letter:

> Following the announcement by the Powers Company that my photoplay, entitled "The Crucifix of Destiny," had won second prize in their contest, I have been besieged with letters from various writers asking for a copy of this manuscript.
> Inasmuch as I have sold this story to the Powers Company, it is their property and it would be very unprofessional on my part to comply with the request.
> Will you kindly publish this letter that my correspondents may understand that they should direct their inquiries to the Powers Company?

The correspondent quoted last week was Dr. J. R. Clemens, who writes that it is his practise to immediately destroy all carbons of a purchased script, that there may be no possibility of duplication.

There is no more foolish belief than that the study of a prize script will enable the unimaginative to win success. It is easy to obtain knowledge of photoplay form at the cost of four cents in stamps. The rest is ability, plus intelligent study and experience, and the best place to study the script is on the screen. Look at good photoplays, then try to reduce them to writing as a study of form and assimilate the fine points as a study of technique, but form and technique, unbacked by idea, are without value.

To paraphrase Davy Crockett, be sure you can think plots, then go ahead.

Says He Wants Some.

For the benefit of those who seek to make sales to speculative companies, we note the request of James Ashton Reid, photoplay editor for the Great Eastern Film Company, 218 Tremont Street, Boston, for high class society plays. The letterhead of the company announces that it makes commercial and feature films.

Caustic But—

Recently Mr. Horace G. Plimpton, of the Edison Company, expressed the belief that photoplay writing had been made to appear too easy of accomplishment, and another editor of a well-known company writes us in this connection:

> I think that the movement to discourage the idea among writers that photoplay writing is easy is mighty good. Mayhap if they realize what photoplay writing really means it won't be so much of a case of fools rushing in where angels fear to tread.

To all of which many will say amen. It is to be regretted, most sincerely regretted, that those who are palpably without chance of success should be encouraged to waste their time, but on the other hand, while photoplay writing is in one sense perhaps the most difficult form of literary endeavor, it is by no means the trained writer who is the most likely to succeed. To the contrary, there are many of not more than average intelligence and literary ability of slight order who are able to make more of a real success than the writer who is accustomed to trusting solely to style rather than novelty of idea.

To think in words is one thing. To think in clear action is another, but because the work seems easy there are drawn to it many—too many—persons who cannot think at all. That's where the trouble lies.

A Unique Photoplay.

We are indebted to M. C. A. Frambers for the details of photoplay composite that is rather unique. It reads almost as though Mr. Frambers had had a welch rarebit dream and had jotted down the results. The film Mr. Frambers fails to identify is an Independent Titanic special that was released at the time of the catastrophe. Here is the letter:

> A few days ago while walking at random, I was attracted to a theater displaying large banners reading "Latest and best pictures of 'Sinking of the Titanic,' portraying scenes aboard the sinking vessel, also the escape through the ice," etc. Realizing that this was a fake, curiosity prompted me to enter and I was greeted with what I would term an outrageous deception. In other words, it was a puzzle, indeed a very interesting one for a spectator who follows up the moving pictures to try and solve from what pictures the various scenes had been taken. The portrayal of Washington Crossing the Delaware to represent the hapless victims of the Titanic making their way through the ice, is to say the least, absurd. Here and there a few feet of Captain Smith looking about the boat would be inserted to bring back the Titanic atmosphere. Perhaps some "fans" who are continually inquiring about deaths of moving picture stars will, when seeing this film, quickly write to see if Miss Gene Gauntier was lost in the Titanic disaster as she is shown on board.
> From the best of my recollection I have made up a scenario covering most of the reel which no doubt will be of some interest to your readers.

Writing the Editor.

Don't be in too much of a hurry to grab at the editor's name when you want to write. The other day we told of some genius who sought to bribe the Reliance Company's office boy, and we are indebted to Mr. Terwilliger for another instance. He dictated a letter to a photoplaywright when he was down from the Catskills one day during the company's stay in the mountains. There was no time to wait to sign the letter and it was signed with the stenographer's name. Promptly the author sat down and wrote a long letter to the person signing, under the impression that he was writing the editor, and wrote himself down, if not as ass at least an unintelligent person.

Don't grab at every name you see in the belief that it is the editor. Write the sort of stuff that's really good and then you'll find out who's the editor. Don't be in a hurry.

An Optimist for Cause.

Hettie Gray Baker is admitted to our thirty-third degree because she has passed her novitiate. She spent one year writing one salable script, but meantime she learned how to write them. Make note of the reference to the need for keeping stuff on the market. It's one reason why there are so few writers who make photoplay writing a means of livelihood. No grocer ever got rich buying a pound of sugar at a time and buying another pound when the first was sold. You are a merchant of ideas. If you have a small stock you have a small income. Have your sugar in barrels, and have both white and brown, loaf, granulated and powdered. Read what Miss Baker writes:

> Your advice is the issue of August 31 to the inquirer who seemed to doubt that producers really buy outside "stuff" was helpful to everyone. But your correspondent makes a mistake to be discouraged. A year is not a long apprenticeship and there is always the hope of an acceptance to cheer one up. There are two things to do,—keep everlastingly at it; keep an open, alert mind. Everybody was an outsider once; those on the inside are there simply because their work can be depended upon and comes up to the mark. So far from the beginner being frowned upon, my experience has been that editors are quick to encourage him.
> For myself, I am entirely unknown, haven't the slightest pull, no experience as a journalist and very little indeed as a magazine writer, and that outside the realm of fiction. So what I have sold has been entirely on its merits. The first year I sold just one. At that time I considered the others I had written "just as good as you see on the screen," but now I blush every time I think of them. It didn't even occur to me that it was possible to give up, and I kept at it. The second year is just finished, and I have sold fifteen. Fifteen in a year is a very comfortable number for a beginner, and when I say that I sold fifteen times as many the second year as the first it sounds very impressive! I hope your correspondent will have the same experience or better.
> Possibly he does not keep enough Mss. out. I make it a rule to have at least ten,—just at present there are fourteen. Perhaps he does not think in terms of playwrighting. Library catalogers will tell you that whenever they hear a new book mentioned, the Dewey or Cutter number for its classification will come to mind. A photoplaywright should have the same habit of thought as to plays,—every theme should present itself in scenario form. A Mss. of which I am particularly fond has its origin in a laughing comment on the incongruity of elaborate jewelry on a very plain, simply dressed woman of our acquaintance. What is more to the point, I sold it at a good price to one of the best companies, first time at bat.

I wonder if the following suggestion is new: The method of consideration at Edison is such that one gets a quicker decision to enclose with the Mss., which of course includes a synopsis, five extra copies of that synopsis. These extra copies should be unsigned, and I write across the top, "These copies of the synopsis are for use of directors, and need not be returned in case of rejection of manuscript," since directors should be at liberty to mark them up as they like.

Do you know if there are any companies beside Edison to which this might apply? Since the synopsis is under 250 words it is a small matter to make the extra copies each time the script goes out. It occurs to me as I write this, that to have five copies of your synopsis floating carelessly around some studios might lead to 'unconscious plagiarism," and while there is no fear of the Edison studio it might be just as well to be careful about some others of lesser rank.

The Edison Company is the only one in which the scheme is followed of supplying each director with a synopsis. It is the copying of these synopses that led in part to the 250 word requirement, and the copying is also responsible for the slow reading by that company. Scripts provided with copies of the synopsis will naturally be advanced over those waiting their turn at the machine.

The Staff Authors.

A reader asks for comment on the recent prediction that photoplay studios would eventually establish staff authors and do their own stories, refusing unsolicited scripts.

We do not believe that any company will ever succeed in writing all its own plays, and making good, no matter how clever may be the staff members. It was because of the inability of the directors to supply fresh ideas that the first call for outside scripts was made, and the only companies that we know of that make all their scripts in the studio are doing poor work because of the sameness of idea. There is not more than one writer in a thousand who can write two good photoplays a week for a year and repeat his performance. There are not more than two in each hundred who can write one a week and hold to standard week in and week out. Most of these men are under contract already.

We think that many companies will follow the Essanay plan in withdrawing from the market and dealing only with those who can show a high percentage of acceptances, but the company that depends wholly upon a staff of two to five writers courts artistic and, eventually, business suicide.

There is a growing tendency in some studios to deal with certain writers to the exclusion of others, and it is not an easy matter to break into this group, but this is partly due to the fact that there are more idea thieves writing photoplays than in any other line of literary work. Some of them do not even realize that they are thieves and scarcely a week passes that we do not receive one or more inquiries, made in perfect good faith, as to the propriety of using copyrighted stories as foundations for photoplays.

There is and always will be an open market for the man who can win legitimate success and this market will broaden rather than narrow. The time will come when photoplays will sell because the plot and production are good rather than because the reel is the release for a certain date. That's the time we're waiting for.

Sound Sense.

Here's a paragraph from David Morrison, of Philadelphia, that seems to hit the situation about as we see it. He writes:

> No one is forced into the motion picture game. Photo play writing is certainly not compulsory and I should think those dissatisfied writers who regard it as insufficiently remunerative would turn their "valuable" time and attention to more profitable fields, but let me state that even though I had yet to receive my first check, I would still be writing scripts, as I know of no better practise and aid in plot development for the young author than writing motion pictures.

Mr. Morrison himself had written some thirty scripts of which twelve have sold, and naturally he is not one of those who thinks that the editors discriminate in favor of the influential. And in the same mail comes another letter from a man with no influence other than the ability to write good stories who in twenty days has collected $139, the odd nine being a newspaper story about photoplay. He has no pull other than his plots. He does not do as well every twenty days, but he has steady sales because he send good stuff out.

Don't Look in the Windows.

Did it ever occur to you that if you start down the street with a certain destination in mind you arrive at that point more quickly if you take the most direct route and do not stop to look into the show windows of the shops? Carry your cogitation further and apply it to your writing. Perhaps your scripts do not sell because you look into too many windows and the busy photoplay editor has no time to take you by the arm and walk you past the displays.

Putting it into plainer English, stick to your story.

Every story has one main theme, one direct line of development. If you digress you lose the main theme and possibly the interest of your audience. If you have a tendency that way sit down and figure your story out. Take each proposition separately, like this.

(a) Mabel wants to go on the stage.
(b) Her parents object.
(c) She runs away from home.
(d) She comes to New York.
(e) She meets another girl.
(f) Who introduces her to a manager.
(g) She is given a chance.
(h) She is a failure.
(i) She avoids temptation.
(j) And returns home.

Now study your line-up. The main points are c and j. Mabel runs away from home and come back again. To give a cause you need a and b, her desire to be an actress and parental objection. To lead to the effect you need h, her failure. That's the real story. The rest of the clauses simply modify your principal proposition. Make these points clear and you have a story. Dress them up with the other points and you add to the interest of that story. If the action runs too long trim down by eliminating the least essential minor clauses. It may be that your play can be shortened by eliminating the girl in e that Mabel meets or it may be that the girl is more valuable in interest than the fact that Mabel is tempted to accept the protection of some man about town to avoid returning home and confessing her failure. Eliminate whichever promises the least return and stick to the other.

The example given is too simple to allow much variation, but if you will plot your intricate story in the same fashion you'll soon find yourself able to pick out the main thread from the trimmings and hold your story to a straight course. More than one good idea has been killed because unconsciously the author had been led from the real story into the development of the minor issues. This doesn't seem possible, but it's happening every day. Let the others look in the windows.

Don't Force the Pace.

We looked over a script the other day in which the writer put in every dramatic feature he could think of in the evident belief that he was writing a strong play. He thought of everything except a gripping plot and the result was just the sort of hash that might have been expected.

Take this as your rule and guide. If you have to force dramatic incident into your photoplay to make it look like anything at all, your plot itself is at fault.

If you have the properly dramatic idea it will express itself in dramatic action and you will not have to introduce incident to conceal a lack of natural happenings.

Of course it is possible to take a script and build it up by increasing the tensity of the natural situations, and you should not rest content until you are completely satisfied that you've presented the idea in the best and strongest form, but it is one thing to build up an incident and quite another to shove in some utterly irrelevent happening because your natural run of action lacks strength.

Evidently the writer in question had seen interesting things follow the destruction of a letter by the evil genius of the play. It struck him as being a valuable prop, so he had his hero sit down and write a more or less relevant letter to his mother. The wicked brother got it from the carrier and used it to light his pipe with.

The burned letter had nothing to do with the plot. So far as the development of the story went, the delivery or destruction of the letter did not affect the plot in the least, and so, when the big scene came, it did not interest anyone because it was merely a bit of extraneous business dragged in by the neck to pad out a weak development.

Had the movement of the plot depended upon the letter, its loss would have been important, but the letter had nothing to do with the story since it recited facts already known and having no bearing on the development, and the result was a false situation.

Had the plot been a strong one, its unfolding would have suggested scenes of sufficient dramatic quality to hold the interest. Lacking this natural interest, the spineless story could not be bolstered up.

What may be interesting in one story becomes claptrap in another because it does not belong to the development and the harder you try to jack up a hopeless situation with extraneous matter, the more hopeless does the case become.

The trained writer instinctively grasps the possibilities of his story, roughly but completely. He strengthens these possibilities by careful and workmanlike development, but he does not kill a man every two or three scenes just to help things out.

Study the possibilities of your story before you start to write it. If it seems to possess no possibilities think up something else. That idea is not ripe and is not ready to be picked.

Send to Eclair Direct.

Remove the Eclair from the list of those companies for which the Universal reads. Send all scripts for Eclair to that company at 225 West 42d street, New York City. Those holding slips will please make note on same. Eclair was in the Universal, but finds that it can do better to read direct. Nothing is to be taken as suggesting that the Eclair Company is no longer with the Universal. This announcement applies solely to manuscript submissions. They want to read direct, possibly having the reasonable opinion that they know better than Hal Reid what they want and what they want to pay.

All to New York.

In reference to a recent item Hal Reid advises us that all scripts intended for the Western as well as Eastern branches of the Universal should be sent to the Universal, at 1 Union Square, New York City. None should be sent to Los Angeles.

Champion, Gem, Imp, Powers, Nestor, Bison-Universal and Rex should all go to the above address.

COLEMAN BROS. BUILDING NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

Messrs. Coleman Brothers, proprietors and managers of the Avenue Theater, 145th Street and Third Avenue, New York City, are building a first-class moving picture house at Westchester Avenue and 156th Street. The seating capacity will be 1,000 and when it is completed it will be the largest theater in Greater New York, built exclusively for motion pictures. The estimated cost is $80,000.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"THROUGH DUMB LUCK" (Biograph), Aug. 26.—Comedy with some laughs, but not strong.

"MR. GROUCH AT THE SEASHORE" (Biograph), Aug. 26.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this amusing skit. It has to do with a jealous husband and a wife who is fond of bathing. Taken as a whole, the reel is well worth while.

"THE LIVE WIRE" (Pathe), Aug. 28.—This film is happily named. The exhibitors will find it a live wire in fact. Paul Panzer and William H. Cavanaugh, the former particularly, make fun in chunks. Panzer has an opportunity, and he accepts it. The picture starts off innocently enough. A wire superintendent gets word that a wire is down and sends out two linemen to fix it up. The men locate the break and one of them climbs the pole. While at work he discovers the Indian and gets to the ground—quick—and away from the neighborhood. The Indian (Panzer), accidentally touches the wire. Things happen. Not satisfied, he examines the wire. More things happen. He goes back to camp and brings out all the bucks—all but one, a cripple. In turn they all try the wire, and all do stunts. Meanwhile the two linemen have got back to the station, and shut off the current. Also meanwhile the cripple gets to the break just as the chief announces that any one who will conquer the evil spirit in the troublesome object may have his daughter and take his place as chief. The cripple gets on the job. He puts the wire around his neck, he even bites it. Of course the wire is harmless. The cripple is lifted on to the shoulders of his companions and carried back to camp. The chief makes good.

"THE WOMAN HATER" (Kalem), Aug. 28.—Fair comedy. It all goes to prove that while a man may be a woman hater, speaking generally, there may be exceptions. There was one in this case.

"PALESTINE" (Kalem), Aug. 28.—On the same reel as the foregoing are some fine Biblical scenes. Two that perhaps will excite the most interest are views of the Garden of Gethsemane and the Mount of Olives and a panoramic view of the city of Jerusalem.

"HELPING JOHN" (Edison), Aug. 28.—Bigelow Cooper and Marian Nesbitt have the leads in a most amusing comedy-drama of the Stock Exchange. It is good stuff all the way. Robert Brower as the broker for the broker's wife, contributes his share of the fine work. There is a Stock Exchange floor scene which, if possible, exceeds in realism the successful picture in "The Passer-By." There is a touch of drama at the close of the reel, which rounds out a most successful picture.

"THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR" (Cines), Aug. 27.—This is strong tragedy. It is well played and finely staged and costumed.

"A PUEBLO LEGEND" (Biograph), Aug. 29.—This story, which makes more than a reel, is laid in the Pueblo of Isleta, in New Mexico. Its period is early Indian, antedating the Spanish occupation. Perhaps it will prove to be more interesting by reason of its spectacular features than its dramatic quality. There are fine photographs of the pueblo and of its vicinity, and in this phase of the picture alone it will partake of the educational film. There are some excellent landscapes. It is plainly apparent that a great deal of care has been taken in the making of this picture.

"THREE TO ONE" (Essanay), Aug. 29.—Old stuff, very well put on, but it will probably appeal to a great many picture-goers who have not seen its predecessors. Hink & Dink (how essentially Chicagoese?), are real estate dealers; they have a clerk. The three are in love with the stenographer. The clerk wins out. The comedy is good.

"HIS PARTNER'S SHARE" (Melies), Aug. 29.—The story is of two prospectors, who strike gold. Ray slips from cliff, is injured, and left by Paul as dead. Ray is picked up by surveyors, taken to their camp and nursed back to health. Paul hides all evidence that he ever had a partner and sells the claim. Ray later visits the site and finds in possession men who show him a bill of sale for $150,000. Paul returns to the city to his family. Ray, in want, in the city, breaks into a house and is discovered by the owner, who proves to be his old partner, described as living in luxury. There is no indication of this in the setting. Paul gives his partner a check for $50,000, though why not $75,000 does not appear.

"TWO CINDERS" (Vitagraph), Aug. 28.—A few simple episodes on a traveling train, with Miss Turner and Mr. Bunny as the participants. The incidents are amusing, made so more by the natural ability of the two to make fun than because of any real plot in the picture.

"BUMPS" (Vitagraph), Aug. 28.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this story of the circus. To lend the proper color to the show there is a circus parade, with the entire outfit of camels, elephants and horses, and great wagons. Kenneth Casey is starred as a young elephant trainer, and his work will interest. He displays absolute disregard for the great beast; the beast apparently shows regard for him. There is a circus fire, which as a panic is not particularly convincing, although this is a minor matter. The reel as a whole will make a most desirable offering.

"THE LITTLE INDIAN MARTYR" (Selig), Aug. 29.—This is a splendid story. Its chief characters are a monk and a small boy. They are worthy of high praise for their excellent work. The scenes are laid in and around San Juan Capistrano. A large company, Indians, soldiers, etc., are also in the cast. It is a fine production from start to finish.

"THE MUSKETEER'S LOVE" (C. G. P. C.), Aug. 30.—A romantic picture that, in its plot, is quite artificial, there being nothing in it either novel or very human. In its acting it is stilted. The fine hand-coloring is its chief asset, but the costumes and sets are in keeping with the theme and are very good. The story takes place in the court of Louis XIII. Spectators like colored films; they feel that they get more for their money out of them.

"FOR THE LOVE OF A GIRL" (Lubin), Aug. 29.—A romantic picture in which the unlucky one of a girl's two suitors, though rejected, still keeps honorable love in his heart and shows himself willing to sacrifice himself to help the girl and her husband. The chance is given to him by the peculiar conditions of a will made by the girl's uncle, who is his foster father. The object of the picture is to show the quality of the man's love and how it is rewarded in the end. She becomes a widow. Such a picture is apt to please the average spectator. It is not very striking, nor very original, but it is well acted and somewhat emotional.

"BOND OF MUSIC" (Vitagraph), Aug. 31.—Generally speaking, there are three things that art, if it fails to treat reverently, does so at its peril. These three are religion (anybody's religion), love and patriotism. In this picture, the "bond of music" and the love of a musician for his favorite pupil count more with the old master than his patriotic duty to his country. His pupil was a spy. It was just before the Franco-Prussian war. He helps this pupil to elude the authorities and in later scenes the pupil comes back at the head of an invading army which destroys the city. The picture, except for this weakness, if in this case it is one, is very well done, in fact is tremendous. The military scenes are perfect. The destruction of the city seems very real.

"THE BOY AND THE GIRL" (Edison), Aug. 30.—A picture with the object of showing the heroism of a lad, son of rich parents who, so to speak, kept him in a hot-house, never letting him romp with other boys. It is an interesting study very well done and will generally be liked.

"JIM BLUDSO" (Kalem), Aug. 30.—The poem by this name by the late Secretary Hay is widely known. This picture illustrates the poem, using quotations from it for leaders, the scenes given as one man tells another the story. It deals with life on the Mississippi steamboats and shows us a boat on fire. We can not too highly praise those scenes that show the details of steamboat life, on the dock and on the boats. The burning boat was also good; but it was kept on so long that we began to see that the fire was only smoke. As a whole, the picture will excite comment and probably be remembered.

"AN AEROPLANE LOVE AFFAIR" (Pathe), Aug. 31.—A farce comedy that has some deliciously funny moments and some very pretty scenes. It also has an aeroplane elopement when Miss Gwendoline Pates is taken up by Mr. George Beatty in a real biplane. The little leading lady is as charming as can be in these juvenile romantic roles and adds much to the picture. A large audience seemed greatly pleased with the offering.

"THE SHERIFF'S PRISONER" (Lubin), Aug. 31.—This picture of the West is not, strictly speaking, a comedy; but it shows excellent feeling for what is amusing in a situation and is, at times, very effective in making laughter. The ability to blend the serious with the humorous is a rare gift. Pictures in which it is very well done will probably be very popular. In this picture the amusing face of the imprisoned sheriff is shown a bit too often; it begins to weary a bit. The film, as a whole, makes excellent entertainment and will be liked.

"JUST HIS LUCK" (Selig), Aug. 30.—A farce that made more than one good laugh. The audience seemed to like it.

"FRENZIED FINANCE" (Selig), Aug. 30.—On the same reel is this picture which made several laughs. It is almost as good as the former. Together, they make a light but entertaining release.

"THE HERMIT" (Essanay), Aug. 30.—This is a comedy-drama of the great outdoors—wood, field and stream. There are some fine scenes and good photography. There is also a human touch beneath the comedy which sustains the interest throughout the reel.

"SIMLA" (Edison), Aug. 31.—A splendid scenic. Likewise there are some amusing pictures descriptive of the ways and manners of the mountaineers. For instance, navigation of the lake is by means of an inflated bullock hide, which, inverted, maintains an even keel and has sufficient buoyancy to sustain two persons. Fastened together, catamaran style, these unique craft will serve as a ferry. While it is unusual, perhaps, to devote 1,000 feet of film to a scenic, in this case it is justified by the interesting material.

"SAVED FROM COURT-MARTIAL" (Kalem), August 31.—A picture notable more for its spectacular side features than for any dramatic quality. A girl swimmer is prominently featured. Many men are employed in the production.

"AS THE FATES DECREE" (Selig), September 2.—Not even the personality of Kathlyn Williams can make of this story a passable photoplay. It is, of course, desirable in a picture drama that the interest be sustained. It is also, of course, unnecessary to remark that before interest can be sustained it must first be established. If the interest in "As the Fates Decree" be established at all it is too late in the reel to be of any practical use.

"HIS NEW CANE" (Lubin), Sept. 2.—It is difficult even in cold blood adequately to characterize this attempt at comedy. It is a combination of buffoonery and burlesque, reviving old gags long since laid to a deserved rest.

"A SUBSTITUTION" (Lubin), Sept. 2.—On the same reel as the foregoing, and in the opinion of this reviewer could not have been more appropriately and congenially paired.

"IN THE NORTH WOODS" (Biograph), Sept. 2.—Good drama. Biograph has a new "heavy," who is inclined to be melodramatic. The story fails to convince in one essential point. This is where the wife, in the absence of her husband on a trip to the trading post, sets two traps for game. She carries the two implements with no effort, their apparent weight being a couple of pounds apiece. The trap that later "gets" the adventurer she fastens to a stake, which is driven into the ground with a tap. There is in this combination hardly enough to keep a man out of his near-by camp overnight. However, there is good work on the part of the actors—only six of whom appear in the entire reel. There are some charming bits of woodland scenery.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 36."—The feature of this member is the fine series of pictures of the recent meeting of the Czar and the Kaiser at Port Baltic, Russia. There are some good photographs of the recent maneuvers of the army and state guards. Another interesting picture is that of the putting into commission of the French naval vessel Kangaroo, for transporting submarines. There is a great hole or pouch in the bow almost to the waterline, through which the underwater craft may be launched.

"AN EQUINE HERO" (Selig), Sept. 3.—A picture that pleased many in the audience. It features a very well trained and sure-footed horse. The story is artificial and plainly was fabricated to permit a showing of this horse's capabilities. It was not acted very naturally. The horse, smelling out a trail, follows his mistress, who has been captured by drunken Indians, and when he finds her frees her from binding cords with his teeth. She mounts and, riding away to safety, meets her lover who, with a sheriff and posse, is coming to the rescue. The reason as it was shown for her getting into the predicament was not at all convincing. Yet, as we have pointed out, many seemed to like the picture. When some began to applaud there were a few who seemed inclined to make fun of them for it.

"BEATRIX D'ESTE" (C. G. P. C.), Sept. 3.—This producing company has released during the past few weeks a number of pictures giving romantic stories taken from Italian history. All of them, including this of to-day, have had for their backgrounds the beautiful palaces and gardens, with their columned porches, grand stairways, etc., that the old-time heroes and heroines actually saw. The idea seems to be to call back these long-dead players of life's real drama and to make them as nearly as art will permit, live once more their stories for us. It is done in the costumes of the time and is gorgeously colored. This picture, with its fairly dramatic story, its beautiful scenes and accurate settings, is an excellent offering for the public. It is instructive and it is also entertaining.

"RICHARD OF THE LION HEART" (Cines), Aug. 31.—A dramatic series of pictures illustrating the climax of Walter Scott's famous novel, "The Talisman." We cannot praise it too highly; in fact we have never seen anything quite like it before. It has a quality that reminds one, at moments now and then, of illustrations by Howard Pyle, whose work in this line, knights in armor, is known everywhere. It is only at moments that we catch this peculiar effect; but, from first to last, it is restrained and convincingly illustrative. It will charm the small boy, and he should be given a chance to see it. It will instruct him, too. It will also entertain and instruct the small boy's parents. For schools of all kinds and for such associations as "The Knights of King Arthur" it is an ideal entertainer. It is too good to criticise.

"THE TRIANGLE" (Edison), Sept. 3.—Is a very interesting essay dealing with a phase of modern economics that is most perplexing. The triangle is shown to be the manufacturer, the retail merchant, and the workman. The problem that the picture attempts to solve is the temporary stagnation when a diminished demand for goods throws more men out of employment, which keeps on making the condition worse until there is no business at all. The hero of the picture, who is called Mr. Goodfellow, thinks that everyone works too fast, is compelled to do more than his share of work. The picture takes a special case, the clothing trade; deals with individuals and tells a story. This story interests, notwithstanding the fact that the framework is always apparent; it never absolutely convinces. The reason for the interest we take is largely because we are wondering how it is going to solve the problem. Even if we begin to be disappointed, we still are held by the very vital interest in the problem or in any honest discussion of it. It is not art; but it is worth while.

"THE HOODOO HAT" (Kalem), Sept. 2.—A good comedy and a sure laugh-maker. In the first place, the hat is a wonder and something more, and as a top-piece for Miss Ruth Roland, it becomes a situation. Ruth (she is called Delia in the picture) is bound to wear it to the picnic. Not even the sincere consternation on the face of a horse that has to be blindfolded before it will pass, makes her willing to discard it. Most of the laughs come from this clever comedienne's facial expression, but the situation, as it develops and changes, has many comical twists, and we can commend it as a winner.

"FROM JERUSALEM TO THE DEAD SEA" (Kalem), Sept. 2.—On the same reel is the very interesting series of views, well chosen and well photographed. Surely we do not need to point out the value of such pictures for churches, Sunday schools, lectures or any occasions of the kind. The comedy of the reel is clean and wholesome and can be shown anywhere.

"CORONETS AND HEARTS" (Vitagraph), Sept. 3.—A thrilling melodrama, not a work of art. It was designed to tingle the spine and gets over very well. When we have said that it is a success, there is very little left to say. It has its short-comings that the critical-minded will see, but that the people will not see, some lesser assets beside its big one of being thrilling. It pictures high life, for instance; it shows us a big safe deposit vault (the real thing), in which are diamond coronets, stocks, bonds, gems, and no one knows how much wealth; it shows us a lord proposing to an American heiress and winning her only after he has proved himself a hero. Mr. Earle Williams plays the lord; Miss Edith Story the heiress.

Independent

"PLAYING TRUMPS" (Solax), Aug. 30.—Billy Quirk as a lover with two rivals is kept in a great deal of trouble by his joking opponents. They invent shadowgraphs for his discomfort; they bore a hole in the bottom of the boat in which he is to give a row to the object of his affections, and then when the boat is about to sink rescue the girl and leave Billy to swim ashore; they remove the gasoline from Billy's car, and rescue the girl when Billy is stranded on the road. The tide turns, though, and Billy more than gets square. There's quite a bit of fun in it.

"THE MARKED GUN" (American), Sept. 4.—This cannot be said to be a strong production. There is, however, one scene alone which goes a long ways toward mitigating the weakness.

"MABEL'S BEAU" (Majestic), Sept. 3.—Majestic puts over a good comedy-drama. There are some scenes which will make hearty laughter; there are others which will swing the pendulum a little to the other side. The unexpected happens several times.

"THE GIRLS AND THE CHAPERONE" (Nestor), Sept. 5.—There is good comedy in this story. It follows an old theme—that of masquerading a man dressed as a woman—but here the subject is so well treated that it seems new.

"LOVE WILL FIND A WAY" (Powers), Sept. 4.—The old story of squabbling neighbors. Gibbs has a daughter in love with the son of Boggs. The entrance to the property is by way of a common gate. A compromise is suggested by the son to the daughter that the gate be cut in two, and the plan is carried out. So far as the second generation is concerned the expedient is satisfactory. When the parents essay to pass out the gate at the same time they get stuck. Right here is where the comedy comes in.

"FROM THE WILDS" (Rex), Sept. 5.—Rex puts over a strong story, a good story. Entirely aside from the quality of the drama, however, this picture will be notable for its charming photography. There are two scenes—the interior of a cabin, lighted, the door wide open, showing the streams of light penetrating the outer darkness. These are effective, unusually so. Also there are many fine outdoor scenes, selected with keen regard for their pictorial beauty.

"THE INTRIGUE" (Imp), Sept. 9.—A story in which an army officer is in love with the daughter of a Japanese count. The count consents to the marriage on condition that the daughter gets certain army plans which the count desires. The story will hold, perhaps, but there are several weaknesses. In the first place, it is hardly likely that an officer of the United States Army would enter an army building with his sweetheart (being obliged to use his key to enter), and show her around a room where maps and plans were exposed. The officer was listed on the leaders as a lieutenant. The two bars on his shoulder indicated the rank of captain. Some of the letters and leaders described the count as the uncle of the girl in the case, others as the father.

"THE VICTIMS OF INGRATITUDE" (Milano), Sept. 7.—In these two reels there are strong situations, and plenty of good acting and continuous incident to hold the interest throughout. There are some beautiful exteriors, one, especially, of an Italian garden, which will charm the eye of any city dweller. In the second reel the tension is sharp, there being two scenes especially effective. These are where the first husband, representing the employes of the shipyard, goes to the wife of the shipowner to extend the congratulations of the employees, and meets his former wife, who had believed him dead; the second, where the employes, with bared heads, are escorting from the yard the body of the first husband, who had deliberately cut the air pipe when in a diving suit under water in order to do what he could to right a previous wrong. It is a noteworthy production.

"AFTER ALL" (Victor), Sept. 6.—Owen Moore in this rural drama takes the role of the unsuccessful suitor. Florence Lawrence, as always, has the lead on the feminine side and does her best to make things interesting. She has the part of a country girl in most primitive surroundings so far as sartorial accessories are concerned. The writer will admit the play did not stir him; likewise will he confess that those around him praised the picture; and there you are.

"THE EVIDENCE" (Nestor), Sept. 4.—A good Western—one that will please and with no features that will displease.

"THE CELEBRATED CASE" (Gem), Sept. 3.—A finely produced picture in two reels, adapted from the famous play of the same name. It is a story of Napoleon's time and in it a child, deceived by a circumstance that she doesn't understand, accuses her father of a crime he didn't commit. Years later the villainous perpetrator of the crime, who has assumed a title, is "shown up" by a gem. The plot is very well woven and the narrative very clear. It makes an effective offering that charms by its beautiful scenes and its dignified acting while it holds the attention closely.

"IN HONOR BOUND" (Rex), Sept. 1.—A romance of the border, half Mexican, half American. Later it is set in city life. Miss Marion Leonard is charming in her role as the heroine senorita. Later she has married an American who forges a check and is arrested. The outcome of this situation is far from convincing. The picture is not a success, though it has many lovely scenes, in fact the trimming of the stage-sets is absolutely perfect. One could hardly praise too highly the eye that supervised their arrangement.

"ARIZONA LAND SWINDLE" (Bison 101, Universal), Sept. 3.—The value of a big equipment is shown in this as in other Bison 101 pictures. Many prairie wagons, many people with horses and cattle, make the spectator aware that something big is going on, and it adds greatly to the interest he takes in the situation. In this picture we see many families brought out together to a desert by a swindling land speculator, and made desperate. The outcome is happy.

"QUEENIE AND THE CANNIBALS" (Imp), Sept. 7.—The first part of this split reel is a mildly amusing farce. This is its second appearance, having been released first about a year ago.

"LEM'S HOT CHOCOLATES (Imp), Sept. 7.—On the same reel is a new offering, a farce, set in and around a village grocery store. The idea is not new, but it is freshly and cleverly handled, and makes an acceptable offering.

"TWO BRAVE LITTLE HEARTS" (Eclair), Sept. 1.—Two little boys are the center of interest in this picture by the French company. These kids show phenomenal astuteness in trailing a thief who had chloroformed their father and stolen gems that he had in keeping for his employer. The two do marvelous stunts which are not meant to be convincing. It gives amusement by the veiled humor of its "take-off" on the usual detective story, and makes a fair offering.

"THE ACTRESS PULLS THE STRINGS" (Eclair), Sept. 3.—An amusing summer hotel picture. An actress, its heroine (Miss Barbara Tennant), is snubbed by the other guests, because she is an actress. By a clever adaptation of the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde idea she now as an actress and then as demure widow, gives both men and women who have treated her badly in different ways, a good lesson. Good acting and many very pretty scenes add much to the value of the film as entertainment.

"THE LOVE TEST" (Imp), Sept. 2.—An absorbing and very effective melodrama. Miss Vivian Prescott plays the lead in it and is heart-breaking in her interpretation of a gripping situation. Her role is a stenographer, who is innocent where she seems most guilty, and who, though weakly stumbling, is true to herself. Her truth and goodness are proved after an intense climax. The film makes a first-class offering, a strong picture.

"THE TARES OF THE WHEAT" (Imp), Sept. 5.—A well-knit dramatic picture of a crime in which the suspense is held up remarkably. It gets its title from the denouement in which the evil perpetrater of the crime is not prosecuted on account of his righteous brother. It is finely held together in every way, by sets, acting and the general conduct of its action. A good offering.

"ON THE BORDER LINE" (Nestor), Sept. 2.—One can find two meanings in this title. It deals with a rancher and his wife and a third man, who, posing as a government surveyor, tries to levy blackmail by claiming a change in the border line. Again its climax comes when the rancher's wife, weary of Western life, is on the border line of an elopement with the stranger. But the crafty swindler, who, by the way, is a new and interesting figure in pictures, is "shown up" in time to save the situation in both directions. The photography isn't quite so good as usual in films made by Nestor. The story is interesting and perfectly clear. The offering is a fairly good one.

"A STRANGER AT COYOTE" (American), Sept. 4.—The stranger who comes to Coyote finds love and villainy there. He takes a hand as usual, helps along a love story, and finds a mate for himself. It is acted with the usual clear cut effectiveness by the premier Flying A Company, and holds the attention, but it isn't as convincing as usual. There is no real passion in it and the camera work isn't up to the company's high standard.

"THE HEART OF A COSSACK" (Reliance), Sept. 4.—A romance of Russia in the Middle Ages. In the costumes, make-up sets, etc., which are full of atmosphere and very commendable, there is a smack of the Tartar. Its hero is a lieutenant who has to carry off his sweetheart to save her from a forced marriage with his general. There is a pursuit at night through a dark forest (very Russian); the pair are overtaken, but everything turns out happily. It has been very carefully produced, even the minutest things show commendable forethought. It ranks high as entertainment, because of its freshness (we haven't seen many Russian pictures). The narrative is clear and pretty effective. The photography is excellent in most of its scenes.

"THE CRIPPLE'S TALLY" (Lux), Sept. 6.—The best part of this picture is a very well-made and interesting set of fire views. It shows the old style way of putting out fires, the bucket brigade, and such an engine as the Honorary and Exempt Volunteer Fireman's Association draws through the streets on Washington's birthday. The story is not fresh, nor very convincing, but is well pictured and gives some beautiful scenes.

"THE DENTIST'S DILEMMA" (Comet), Sept. 2.—The scenario of this picture would make a good joke book story and the idea in it brings a good laugh by its very preposterousness. It is too small a situation for a whole reel of film and the necessity of making fun lays too heavy a burden on the players whose work, while often amusing, is not always so. It was produced in a fashion that reminds one of newspaper cartoon series.

"A MIDNIGHT ENCOUNTER" (Gaumont), Sept. 5.—The excellent stage sets with the high quality of acting that are to be expected in Gaumont productions are found in this. It isn't a very dramatic picture. Its weakness comes partly because the contrasts are not sharp enough and the real meaning of the situation is a bit blurred. American audiences are not so apt to see and differentiate the shades of meaning in such a picture as are the Continental peoples. It will give more entertainment to an intelligent audience than to one not so quick to catch subtle meanings. There is no physical struggle pictured; it all takes place in conversations which many we fear must miss.

"THE DEFORMATION OF TUBES DUE TO HYDRAULIC PRESSURE" (Gaumont), Sept. 5.—On the same reel is this scientific curiosity. The name will frighten, but the eyes will see something quite novel and interesting.

"THE PLEASURES OF CAMPING" (Majestic), Sept. 8.—A series of loosely connected views giving in comedy vein the adventures of a young man and his wife who camp out in a lonely place. The photography is poor and this is a serious drawback.

"WILLIE'S DOG" (Majestic), Sept. 8.—On the same reel is this slight, but amusing farce comedy. Herbert Prior and Mabel Trunnelle, with several other figures, including a frolicsome bull pup, play it and bring out more than one good laugh.

"THE DAWN OF PASSION" (American), Sept. 9.—A strange study of human life in half-wild, hill white people, who haven't taught themselves to conceal their emotions. It takes courage in a producer and in a scenario written to show the naked soul just as it is; one shrinks from it. Yet doing it is a true service. There is a something in this picture that is in advance. It surely is a gripping picture. One other excellent thing in it is its views of a beautiful country, which are finely photographed. It is played by the premier Flying A Company.

"HIS FATHER'S SON" (Thanhouser), Sept. 6.—A very pleasing melodramatic picture whose chief background, shown only near the close, is a beautiful concrete bridge. The father of the picture's hero is a big contractor and his superintendent is in charge of the work. The boy has been a spendthrift and his father has told him he is worthless. He changes his name and gets work, unrecognized by the superintendent on the job. We now see that the superintendent's daughter is to be the heroine and that a foreman (he is soon discharged) is to be the villain. Later, this man attempts to dynamite the "finished work" of the promising young engineer who had come on the job and then supplanted him. Word is brought to the heroine by a poor little boy whom she had helped and she throws the bomb into the river where it explodes, making a splash. The superintendent is glad to give his daughter to the new foreman and introduces him to the contractor, who recognizes his son. The acting and photography are all they ought to be. It's a good film.

"THE CAPTURE OF NEW YORK" (Thanhouser), Sept. 1.—An educational picture giving views of what took place during the recent military maneuvers in Connecticut. These glimpses of camp life and of sham battles are well photographed and very acceptable.

"THE VOICE OF CONSCIENCE" (Thanhouser), Sept. 3.—A study in morbid psychology. In it, a physician, whose duty it was to heal and cure, plays the part of a deceiver in order to work on a weak woman's conscience with a view to a future repentance brought about by remorse. The woman was a patient in his hospital; was already somewhat morbid in her jealousy and showed a mind greatly in need of careful scientific treatment. She attempted to murder the woman in the next cot, her rival in love. The doctor saved the other patient, but let the guilty one think that she had accomplished her insane desire. Not every spectator will like the Doctor's method. The story has an unconvincing climax. The acting sets, photography and all mechanical work are good.

Inquiries

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of studio addresses, kept up-to-date, will be sent if a stamped and addressed return envelope accompanies the request.

RICHARD ROE—Mack Sennett was the invalid in Biograph's "What the Doctor Ordered." We do not place Mr. Hall at present. Dorothy, in Eclair's "The Dreamers," was Miss Barbara Tennant.

E. V.—Write to the Bison-101 that you would like a check or the return of the script. Register the letter. If no reply is received, write again, by registered mail, that you withdraw the script. Then copy the carbon and send it out again. That is the correct procedure, but in view of the fact that Bison has been pretty much up in the air lately, it might be well to wait if you want to take the gamble. We got release slips this morning from another company for stories mailed out February 29th and March 8th.

J. R. C.—Miss Lottie Briscoe was Alice and Howard Mitchell Holden in Lubin's "The Convalescent." And while we have your attention, congratulations on the prize winning.

H. J.—We have not the name of the girl in Biograph's "Willie Becomes an Artist." Perhaps our identifier will cudgel his brains.

V. E.—You should always send a stamped and self addressed envelope with your script. Don't fold one envelope to go inside the other, it cracks open. Get the sizes that are known as numbers ten and eleven. Any large shop will have them. Get them in manila rather than in the nice white paper because the yellows are stronger. It's all right to have "only" three pages of single-spaced matter, provided you have the idea all down. It's all right if you can do it in two pages. You are paid for a half or a whole reel, not for the number of words you employ, and so that you are plain the fewer the better.

W. J. B.—If you sent a return envelope with your script you will probably get it back, but why not find out before you send a script in whether the person to whom it is sent is in the market for scripts or agent for foreign films? The company you mention is simply a branch of a French concern and does not purchase scripts. If you will send a stamped and addressed envelope we'll let you have a list of those who are in the market for photoplays. If you did not send a return envelope send one now with an apology for your mistake.

B. M. W.—Half-reel comedies are harder to write than full-reels, because you have less space at your command in which to score your point. You can put more in a quart than in a pint. It's the same with plots. The point is that you have to get a quart of plot into a pint of film. An editor does not prefer too few or too many scenes. He prefers enough scenes to get the plot over in. If you'll tend strictly to the business of getting your story on paper the director will do the rest. Eighteen scenes are not too many, nor yet too few for a comedy, but it depends on the sort of scenes you write how much film you use. Try and learn to think in action and minutes, not in words and scenes.

A. C.—The real princess in Biograph's "Lena and the Geese," was Miss Mae Marsh, now with Kalem. We hate to refuse a lady anything, but we do not tell anyone anything about anyone's marriage. You'll have to keep on guessing about Edwin August, but he will be at the photoplay dinner Saturday, and we'll ask him, and if he says to tell whether he is or not, in fact if he begs us to tell, we'll tell. The dark haired girl in Biograph's "The Black Sheep," is Miss Dorothy Bernard.

PICTURES FROM CHINA AND JAPAN.

William Evans, one of the camera operators with Essanay Western Stock Company, recently returned from a trip through Japan, China and the Philippines, where he made several full reel pictures of absorbing interest. The first of these entitled "Across the Broad Pacific," will be released Sept. 24th, and deals with the land of the Mikado. The second, "China and the Chinese," is an intimate view of the new republic and will be released during the first weeks of October.

Fire Danger in Rewinding.

JUST now there is a considerable splutter about fireproof rewinding devices. I notice that the manufacturer of one device which is advertised as fireproof, gravely informs us that the motor which drives it has such speed that it will rewind one thousand feet of film in one minute. Now, I would like to have someone explain to me exactly where the danger of fire comes in in rewinding. I have never yet heard of a fire started in the process of rewinding a film in the theater operating room. I suppose when we get the rewinders fireproofed, the next agitation will be set up by some asbestos manufacturer in an endeavor to get the operator encased in fireproof clothes. There really might be some sense in that, since the operator's temper might be easily raised to the burning point as he contemplates some of the junk he is expected to put through a projection machine, and get results on the screen with.

Seriously, however, I see no particular need for fireproof rewinders. In fact, I regard such a device as a distinct disadvantage. The film should be in sight when it is being rewound, and a thousand feet of film should not be rewound in one minute—at the rate of more than sixteen feet per second. There is no necessity for such speed. A rewinder operating very fast is noisy, since a reel of film is pretty certain to be more or less unbalanced; also there is danger of ripping up a lot of film if anything goes wrong. The reel, which has just been run through a projector, will not, in ordinary practice, be used again for nearly an hour—possibly more. Why, therefore, should it be shot through a rewinder in one minute, thus endangering the film, straining the rewinder and making a lot of noise which will probably be heard by the audience?

If authorities would, as I have time and again pointed out, exercise just a little, plain ordinary horse sense in their requirements as regards the fireproofing of operating rooms (fireproofing in operating rooms includes three items, without any one of which the room is by no means fireproof) they would not need to bother their heads about operating room fires, or care particularly whether they occurred or not.

I will again say that it is a perfectly simple matter to so build an operating room that a fire can occur at any time, burn up half a dozen reels of film, and do no damage whatever outside of the operating room; also the audience will never know there has been a fire in the house, since the wall shutters will close within two seconds of the starting of the fire, and all smoke and flame will pass away to the open air. Why, why, why is this not done? If they do not know how, the editor of this department will be glad to tell them, without money or other compensation. It is easy, though I will agree that its application is not practical in some of the existing houses (though it could be done after a fashion in any house) since it involves a vent pipe of ample size to the open air.

The lawmakers seem to be obsessed with the one idea of preventing fires—which absolutely cannot be done so long as inflammable film is used, though their number may be greatly reduced, of course. But why bend all energy to that end and utterly neglect points of much greater importance?

Why Is a Rheostat?

San Francisco, Cal., writes:

Oh me! Oh my! That mysterious rheostat, half-brother to the reformer and third cousin of the stupefier! What good is it anyway? Only gets hot and makes life miserable for the operator. A permanent, necessary, extra expense to the manager, and as a goat getter—well all the rest of the apparatus pertaining to projection must doff hats to this reluctant piece of apparatus. But I think I will have to take its part, since I believe it gets blamed for many things which are not its fault, as I shall try to explain. I am going to try to explain the what, how and why of the rheostat and the action of current and the arc when working with it. I invite inquiries and criticism, and if I am wrong on any of the points I would like to be corrected for the good of myself and the brothers who may read this. I shall proceed seriatim, although without going into detail too much, since if I did I could write more on this subject than I did on candlepower some two years ago. I was greatly disappointed after watching the department for about six months, or rather ever since (for I grab for the WORLD as soon as it gets in) expecting to see the article published. I assure you, Bro. Richardson, I don't enjoy writing five or six thousand words, if it is going to do no one, not even myself, any good. I promise you I had a thoroughly good review on candlepower, and anyone would have had to go some to stick me on how to measure cp. of various lamps.

In order to understand how a rheostat works one must know the fundamental principles of the science of electricity, the effects produced by it and the laws it follows. I am not going to explain the laws of electricity, for that can best be studied from some book on applied electricity, and I advise any man who is trying to become a good operator to study electricity, for it is very important in our business. In every electrical circuit there are three important factors, and their true relation must be clearly understood. First: The force tending to move the current, the electromotive force, or voltage as it is commonly called. Second: The rate of flow of the current, or amperage as we call it. Third: The resistance which the force or voltage must overcome to produce the current flow or amperage.

These three factors are analogous to the flow of water through a pipe. They may best be explained by comparison. The force which causes the flow of water through a pipe is due to its head, or pressure. That which resists the flow is the friction of the water against the inside of the pipe. This is proportional to the pipe diameter and flow. The rate of flow, or amount in gallons per minute, is a ratio between the head and the resistance, since as the head increases the rate of flow and the resistance increases in proportion. As the resistance increases, pressure remaining constant, the amount decreases. In the case of a continuous current flowing through a conductor, the voltage corresponds to the head, and the resistance the conductor offers to the flow of current, corresponds to the friction offered by the pipe. The strength or amperage of a continuous current, or the rate of flow of a continuous current, is also a ratio between the voltage and the resistance of the conductor through which the current is flowing, and is what is called "Ohm's Law," when applied to electricity. Hence we have, Ohm's Law: "The strength of a continuous current of electricity in a circuit is directly proportional to the electromotive force, and inversely proportional to the resistance of the circuit, and is equal to the quotient obtained from dividing the electromotive force by the resistance." Now according to Ohm's Law, $E=I\times R$, or voltage, equals amperage times resistance, hence it follows from this that the voltage is the force or difference of potential that would force one ampere through a resistance of one ohm. The ohm is the practical unit of resistance, and is that amount of resistance possessed by a conductor, where the difference of potential or voltage of one volt between its two ends cause a current of one ampere to flow, that is one coulomb per second. An ampere is the amount of current produced in a conductor having a resistance of one ohm, by a difference of potential of one volt. Hence we have $I=E\div R$; $R=E\div I$ and $E=I\times R$ in which I, when E=electromotive force or voltage. I=current in amperes. R=resistance in ohms. Now after a careful study of Ohm's law, keeping in mind the fact that electricity, the same as water, always seeks the path of the least resistance, it will be more easy to understand the action of the current when applied to the arc. A rheostat is nothing more nor less than some sort of high resistance wire or metal placed in series with the arc, or in a circuit, so as to allow only the required amount of amperage to flow, or be consumed, which amount may be varied by changing the voltage or the resistance, as was stated in Ohm's law. In other words the amperage is directly proportional to the voltage and inversely proportional to the resistance, hence with a given resistance if you increase the voltage one volt you also increase the flow of current one ampere or with a given voltage if you increase the resistance one ohm you decrease the flow of current one ampere. Now from what has been said it should be easy to understand how the flow of current or the amperage is, or may be varied.

Now here is the goat-getting part of this mysterious machine which "absorbs," "dissipates," "uses up" or seems to make the voltage disappear. But first let me explain a little more fully the analogies between the flow of water in a pipe and the flow of electricity in a conductor, which will make the following clearer. You, Brother Richardson, having been an engineer, are qualified to judge whether my statements pertaining to the flow of water are correct. 1—Difference of head or level tends to make water flow or fall from the higher head or level to the lower. 1A—Difference of potential or voltage tends to make an electric current flow from point of higher potential or voltage to the point of lower. 2—The difference of head or level acts as a pressure tending to cause a flow of water. 2A—The difference of potential or voltage acts as a pressure tending to cause a flow of current of electricity. 3—If the pressure is not entirely obstructed it actually produces a flow of water. 3A—If the pressure or voltage is not entirely obstructed it actually produces a flow of electric current. 4—Some of the pressure is lost by the friction of the water against the inside of the pipe. 4A—Some of the voltage is lost by the resistance of the conductor. This loss is called the drop of potential. 5—This loss is directly proportional to the length of the pipe and inversely proportional to the diameter. 5A—This loss, due to the resistance, is directly proportional to the length of the conductor and inversely to its cross section. 6—No quantity of water can flow through a pipe without suffering loss by friction. In other words there is no such thing as an absolutely frictionless pipe. 6A—Neither can any quantity of electricity flow through a conductor without suffering some loss from the resistance the conductor offers to its flow, or in other words there positively is no such a thing as a conductor entirely free from resistance. From a careful study of the analogies just stated it will, or should make the following easy of comprehension; but let me state here, it must be understood that electricity is a condition of matter and not matter itself, for it possesses neither weight nor extension, hence my statements that electricity is flowing through a conductor must not be taken too literally. It must not be supposed that any material substance, such as a liquid, is actually flowing through the conductor. The statement that a current of electricity is flowing is merely the usual method of expressing the fact that the conductor is in a different condition than usual. Now, as I have stated, the drop or loss in voltage is directly proportional to the resistance, hence it follows that by increasing the resistance one ohm you decrease the voltage one volt in a closed circuit, or in other words if you have some kind of an electrical machine with a permanent resistance which consumes current, and have an adjustable resistance in series with it, if you increase the resistance one ohm you decrease the amperage one ampere; also the voltage one volt. If, on the other hand, you decrease the resistance one ohm you increase the amperage and voltage respectively one unit. Hence it follows that 110 volts will force through 1 ohm of resistance 110 amperes, but will suffer a loss, or a drop in potential of one volt, or 110 volts will force 25 amperes through 4.4 ohms of resistance, but with a loss of 4.4 volts. In reckoning with an arc light, however, there is another important factor we must not lose track of, viz.: the resistance of the arc. First let me state if a conductor offers a resistance of 5 ohms to a current of 1 ampere, it offers the same amount, no more nor no less, to a current of 25 amperes. Hence it follows the resistance of a given conductor is constant, if the temperature is constant, regardless of voltage or strength of the current flowing through it, but the resistance of a given conductor changes with its temperature, and also with the physical condition of the material. The amount of variation in the resistance caused by change in temperature is too lengthy a subject to go into here, and is of no particular importance to the operator, with the exception of the fact that the higher the temperature of a carbon the less its resistance. Now, before taking up the mysterious actions of the voltage and amperage in connection with the arc, I will explain why there is a loss in voltage and where it goes to. In other words I will try to make clear the reason why the rheostat uses up the difference in voltage, and what becomes of it. From what has been said I think I have made it plain that there is a loss in the voltage or pressure and how it may be calculated, the loss being directly proportional to the resistance. When there is an electric current flowing in a circuit from a higher to a lower potential, electric energy is being expended in heating the conductor which constitutes the circuit, as when water flows through a pipe the friction of the water against the inside of the pipe produces heat in exactly the same manner as heat is produced by rubbing the palms of your hands together. In the former case, however, the friction is very great, and the heat produced is quickly felt, while in the case of water against metal pipes the friction is comparatively very slight and the heat is not perceptible to the sense of touch; but just the same the heat is there, as the principle of the conservation of energy proves. It is not destroyed, but merely exists in another form, having expended its force in raising the temperature of the atmosphere and water.

So it is with the energy expended in an electric circuit. The conductor resists the flow of the current, hence a certain amount of electric energy is transformed into heat energy, which fact may become very noticeable at times, since the conductor may become exceedingly hot—so hot, in fact, that it may be melted by the heat so produced. I could go further and explain that when an electric current has passed through a substance the development of the heat is proportional, first to the resistance of the conductor, second to the square of the current, third to the time during which the current flows. But, as a matter of fact, it matters not to the operator how much heat energy is generated in an arc circuit, or in the rheostat, with the exception of making life miserable for him in a room without sufficient ventilation on a hot day, and it is beyond the scope of our ability to alter matters much when using resistance to control the current. Now after what has been said I think it should be clear why there is a decrease in voltage, and where it goes to; also what a rheostat is, what it is used for, and how it works. But for the benefit of those who cannot solve the mystery of why the voltage is sometimes higher with a small amperage (and sometimes it is higher with a large amperage) and why sometimes there is no voltage at all, but still a high amperage, and why you can pull a longer arc from 220 volt line pressure than you can from 110 volt line pressure, when the amperage is the same, and, in fact, when the arc seems to work backward, or, in other words, as Brother Richardson says, it doesn't seem to check up with common sense. First let me ask you to keep these facts in mind, i. e.: The loss in voltage is directly proportional to the resistance; that an electric current always seeks the path of the least resistance; that the resistance is practically constant and a conductor which offers one ohm of resistance to a flow of one ampere offers a like amount to any amount of amperage, and, last but not least, that an arc lamp is an electrical device having a variable resistance. The closer the carbons are together the less the resistance; the further apart, the greater it is. Remember this: The less the resistance the greater the flow of current, or the more amperage a given voltage can cause to flow.

Now from the sketch we will start with the carbons apart and the arc not burning. Voltmeter, Vm, shows a pressure of 110 volts; also voltmeter (V^1 negligible), while our ammeter, Am, indicates zero amperes. Why? Because there is no work being done, or rather no current flowing, hence no loss in voltage. Rheostat, R, contains 4.4 ohms resistance, arranged so that it may be divided as in an ordinary rheostat. Now, with the adjusting lever L on contact 1, in other words with all the resistance in, bring the carbons together, and instantly V^1 drops to zero (resistance in carbons and due to poor contact being negligible) Am pops up to 25 amperes, Vm still shows 110 volts (or it should if the main wires are large enough to carry the load, and the dynamo supplying the current is not overloaded). What's the matter? First we have all voltage and no amperage, then by just closing the carbons we have all amperage and no voltage. Here is where it tangles with the theory, the closer the carbons the less the resistance; the less the resistance, the higher the amperage, and the higher the amperage, the higher the voltage. But here we have 25 amperes and no voltage at all, feel the terminals on V^1 to see if you get a shock. No. Sure enough there is no voltage. Now take a good look at how you have V^1 connected. Oh, I see the trouble; after closing the carbons you shut V^1 out. As a rule, you must connect a voltmeter across the line to record voltage. Look how V^1 is connected. With your carbons still closed and Am recording 25 amperes connect a voltmeter as is V^2 across C&C, then open switch S..... V^2 will record 105.6 volts, which brings it up to theory. Now closing switch S, V^2 drops to zero, the same as V^1 did when we closed the carbons, which it should. If it doesn't it is due to the work being done, or energy expended in overcoming the resistance of the carbons and the poor contact offered by merely closing the carbons together. Now we open the carbons and light the arc. V^1 will instantly record, and Am drops. Now by just lengthening the arc you will see Am drop still further, and V^1 will go up; but if your arc doesn't break before V^1 reaches 105.6 volts it sure will when it does, because that is all the available voltage you can get, since 110 volts suffers a loss of 4.4 volts by forcing one ampere through a resistance of 4.4 ohms and the length you can pull the arc depends on the gap 105.6 volts will force the current across. Now with your arc lighted and burning steady, and with L on contact 1, note where V^1 and Am is and then move L to the position L^1 you will see V^1 and Am both rise, but open the carbons and your Am drops and V^1 rises still further. Or if you close the carbons Am will rise and V^1 will drop. The reason for this is the arc acts as another rheostat in series. The higher the resistance the less the current, the less the current consumed the less the work 110 volts has to do to force it through R, and the less the work the less the loss or drop. The reason you can pull a longer arc with 220 volts on a 25 ampere arc can be seen from what has been said. There is a higher voltage at the arc.

I have devoted space to the foregoing article, although it is very long, and much of it is a repetition of things already published in this department many times. However, I regard these things of distinct value, and thank the brother for the trouble he has taken. The article on light referred to was not published for two reasons, viz.: It was very long and it was very unquestionable whether that amount of space could be porfitably used in the discussion of cp. measuring. I still have it on file and a day may come when it will seem to fit in. I note that Frisco has entirely ignored the varying size of the gaseous arc-stream which enters largely into arc resistance and varies with amperage. Your diagram and its explanation is most excellent.

Double Letter.

Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

> We are doing business in a small town near here, projecting an 8-foot picture at 35 feet, with a Power's Five. We experienced and remedied a trouble similar to that which is puzzling New York, issue of August 10th; also Nevada, in issue of the previous week. We feel that we should, therefore, set forth our remedy in this, our first contribution to the department. In answer to the before-mentioned letters you advised them to look to their lens, and it was right there we located our own trouble. Our picture had a double appearance around the edges and showed double letters in the titles. We have a three-inch e.f. lens, and when my partner, Mr. A. Olsen, who attends to the operating, took the lenses out of the tube, he found the two back ones interchanged, and with wrong face to the screen. He replaced them properly, and the out-of-focus effect was eliminated; also the double-letter trouble. The frame, however—that is to say, the edges of the picture—was not quite sharp; so, acting on a suggestion received from the department some ago, he placed a ring of paper, possibly ⅛ of an inch wide, in behind the front lens, which acted as a sort of diaphragm; since doing this, though we do not like to boast, we think our picture would compare favorably with any we have seen. I might add that Mr. Olsen was aided greatly in properly replacing the lenses by the instructions contained in the Hand-book. We send best wishes to the Projection Department, and trust that what we have said will prove to be of value to some one.

I want to compliment you, Philadelphia, on your fairness. You have received benefit from the department, and as soon as you saw opportunity to repay the debt thus incurred, by imparting useful information to some one else, you did so. There are literally thousands of operators and managers who have and are receiving benefit through this department, yet who never respond by contributing ideas or experiences of their own to its pages. We are, of course, glad that they are benefited but how much better it would be if they, in their turn, would try to help some one else as you have done. This department is a forum for operators and managers of this and other countries. It is valuable, not so much because I am its editor as by reason of the fact that operators and managers from all over the world contribute ideas and experiences to its columns. The exhibitor in a small town out in, let us say Oregon, would like to put in a light plant of his own. Through the medium of this department he has learned of the experiences of others who have such plants and is thus helped to form an opinion as to their desirability, as well as which kind of plant will best serve his purpose. And what is true of light plants is true of hundreds of other things. If you have an idea, send it in to the department. It is not going to hurt you because somebody else learns something that you know. Live and let live is a very good rule. The surface of the projection field is just barely scratched. We all still have a great deal to learn, so let us all put our shoulders to the wheel and push along the car of knowledge.

Camera Men at Fault.

Binghamton, N. Y., writes:

> It would surely do some of the camera men good if they were made to project their pictures on the screen, referring particularly to marching scenes. In this respect the chief offenders are the Pathe Weekly men. I have run some of those pictures so awfully slow that the automatic shutter will hardly stay open, yet the figures on the screen, marching to a funeral, caused the audience to inquire if we had booked advance views of the Swedish Marathon.

The complaint was respectfully referred to the Pathe Company for investigation. The Pathe Weekly is too splendid a production to be marred by such work on the part of camera men. Later Pathe Freres tell me that the fault complained of did exist for a short time, but has been remedied. I note, however, one cheering fact, viz: Binghamton has at least one operator who has an understanding of what speed means to projection, and who is not content to grind out a scene in which the figures on the screen act like animated jumping jacks.

San Francisco Operators Celebrate.

From San Francisco comes the following:

The Moving Picture Operators' Union
Local No. 162, of San Francisco cordially invites you to attend the celebration of their

Eighth Anniversary to be given at

Schroeder's Cafe, 30 Turk Street

Monday, August 12, 1912

12 o'clock midnight

Sorry, Frisco, but I was busy that evening. However, the Projection Department extends to No. 162 congratulations on this, its eighth birthday. Getting to be quite a boy, aren't you? Able to say your multiplication table clear through, and almost do long division. I understand you have been in long pants for quite a spell. Seriously, however, I hope you had all kinds of a good time, and that the bunch of Turks who gathered on Turk Street, at midnight, August the 12th, will be able to buy turkey, if they want it, every one of the three hundred and sixty-five days in the coming year.

Isolated Light Plants.

A. W. Barthal, Brownsville, Tex., writes:

> Referring to your article, August 10th issue, concerning reports on small light plants, I am the owner of a 6 h.p. Special Electric Fairbanks Morse Engine, running at 400 r.p.m, belted to a 3.5 k.w., 110 volt d.c. dynamo. Same may be had direct connected, but is very much more expensive. This outfit has been in very successful operation for almost two years, running an average of three hours per night, Sundays included. During this time I have had but four breakdowns, which could have been reduced, were I not so badly handicapped, in Matamaros, Mex., where I am using it—a town where neither a screw nor nut can be obtained. Still the city light plant broke down about six times as often, so I am a good many points ahead, besides having a very superior light. The engine, when properly taken care of produces as steady a light as any high-grade steam engine, and the difference in the voltage between full load and no load is practically imperceptible, due to the dynamo being slightly over-compounded. It is built to give 110 volts on no load, and 115 volts on full load, thus regulating itself automatically. I have also a complete switchboard, and the steadiness of the needles on the dials of the ammeter and voltmeter is remarkable, and has thus been admired by many an electrician. I noticed that you, as well as another gentleman, expressed doubt as to the performance of a make and break ignitor at 400 r.p.m. Well, with the exception of the renewals of ignitor points, I have had very little trouble from that source, all parts being very well made and exceedingly hard. Of course, I have bought duplicates of the parts which are most liable to get out of order, so as to avoid time in repairing. From an economical standpoint, however, as far as I am concerned, the outfit is not a success, as I am paying thirty-three cents for gasoline per gallon in wonderful Mexico, of so many possibilities. In a back issue of your paper, a gentleman claimed to be running a duplicate outfit, consuming only five gallons of gasoline in ten hours. I would advise that gentleman to substitute his rather defective paper bag, with which he evidently measures his gasoline, for a more substantial measuring instrument. He will then find that he is using mighty close to nine gallons in that length of time, providing, of course, he has a 6 h.p. engine. I am not from Missouri; I am from Germany, but he will have to show me notwithstanding. I would also advise anyone, intending to buy a similar outfit, not to purchase a dynamo of too high speed, as those machines may become very troublesome in a place where sufficient ventilation cannot be obtained, due to excessive mechanical heat caused by friction of brushes on commutator. Very soft brushes, and, if possible, a fan, to blow on commutator, are very effective remedies in such cases. A speed of 1500 r.p.m. is about as high as I would care to go. Anyone, however, believing that such an outfit can be run by almost any experienced person, need not be surprised if everything goes wrong. In closing I wish yourself and the Projection Department all success.

I am very much obliged to you for your excellent description and report. According to your figures, it is costing about thirty cents an hour to operate your engine. I would not consider this as excessive in cost, provided you are really developing 6 h.p. or approximately 4,500 watts, but it is nevertheless twice what it ought to be, since thirty-three cents a gallon for gasoline is outrageous and almost double what you should pay. It figures out $3.00 for 10 hours, or 30 cents per hour, which would be 30 cents for 4 k.w. hours, or 7½ cents per k.w.—lower than the average central station charge. Possibly a make-and-break ignition would work O. K. on 400 r.p.m, but I would not suppose so. It is quite possible that the gentleman in question was not developing the capacity of his engine.

Ground Detector.

Springfield, Ohio, contributes the following:

> Enclosed find part of an old catalog (1906), in which you will notice that attention is called to the fact that the film could be run backwards in the Optigraph. Thought you might be interested, so sent it along. Almost all operators here read the department, and find in many of the suggestions contained therein an explanation of their various troubles. This theater has its own light plant, consisting of a fifteen h.p. St. Mary's gas engine and a ten k.w., 110 volt d.c. generator. Switchboard contains ammeter and voltmeter; also double throw switch, connecting with city lines. There is a ground detector on the switchboard connected in the following manner: If the ground is on the positive side of the > line, the light on the negative side will burn, and vice versa. We have had trouble with poor ignition, leaking valves, loose belt, sparking brushes, etc., which thoroughly disgusted us with the outfit until we found out what the trouble was, then it didn't seem so bad after all. Have a copy of the Handbook; save all my Moving Picture Worlds, and expect to get a new Handbook as soon as it comes out. Free pictures are being run by an amusement park here, but they do not seem to hurt business in the regular houses. I use two Motiographs; 80-foot throw; 12-foot picture; 40 amperes of current and an aluminum screen. Both machines run by motor; also motor rewind.

I am glad to see that one of the several Springfield men who have received benefit from the department, has concluded to reciprocate. Yes, that is usually the way. After one has learned how to operate a thing, the troubles which were so monumental in size before one "had the answer," usually dwindle to nothing. I must confess I have never understood those ground detectors. Supposing two lamps to be wired in series, as shown, with a tap from the line between them to a ground, what in the world is to prevent the two lamps from burning in series across the lines? Frankly, while I know that ground detectors, consisting of two lamps, will work all right, and are used, I do not know just how they are wired, and would like an explanation of the point I have raised. We shall be glad to hear from Springfield at any time. Many thanks for the catalog.

Remarkable Demonstration.

Some days since the editor was asked to witness the demonstration of a device designed to supplant the use of condensing lenses for projection. It is needless to say that he attended the demonstration, which took place at the Empire Film Exchange, 14th Street and Third Avenue, New York City, in a decidedly "show me" frame of mind. He has learned, through experience, to never declare a thing impossible, no matter how strong the temptation to do so. However, it is difficult to believe some things possible until they are actually shown to us in practical operation. So it was with the condenser substitute proposition.

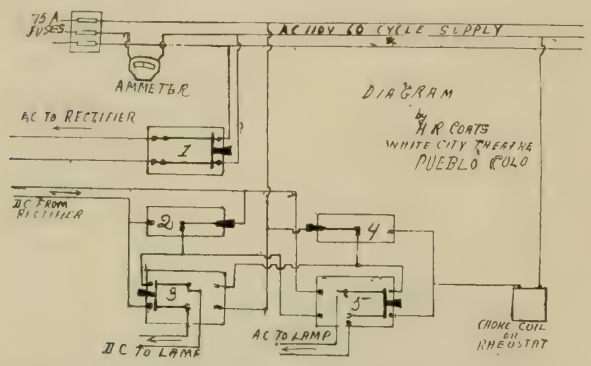
The demonstration at the Empire was a flat failure. However, the owners claimed conditions were not right and offered to repair to an empty theater on 59th Street and 10th Avenue and there deliver the real goods if I would consent to do. This I agreed to do, since the matter was of much importance. I am indeed glad that I did, for, while I am not yet prepared to say that the device is in all ways a success, though inclined to believe it to be, I actually saw an excellent 12-foot, 6-inch picture, well illuminated and with light as white as paper, projected with approximately 12½ amperes D. C. They then projected a reel with 25 amperes. The light was pure white and very strong. And this was done with very imperfect apparatus. It has been promised me that within a week or ten days a perfect apparatus will be available and that the device will then be fully and conclusively demonstrated. There are no condensing lenses. It is claimed, and I believe it to be at least approximately true that 95 per cent. of the light given off by the arc is utilized. The whole device is of metal and there will be little or no change of existing lamphouses necessary.

One phase of the proposition is that, inasmuch as the arc is open at the front(nothing between it and the condenser), it will be necessary, if the device is generally adopted, that the authorities revise their ideas to a large extent, unless some provision can be made for the enclosure for the front of the lamphouse.

Complicated Job of Wiring.

Brother H. R. Coats, operator White City Theater, Pueblo, Colo., sent in a sketch of a somewhat complicated job of wiring, and writes as follows:

> Please find enclosed wiring diagram and directions for use. This is the arrangement I have in my operating room, and I find it very satisfactory and handy. I am submitting it for the help of brother operators who might wish to adopt the same plan. Kindly advise me as to what you think of the diagram and manner of using same.



Wiring arrangement of switches for two lamps operating one on a. c. and the other on d. c. through rectifier or both in series on a. c., using a three wire circuit and ammeter.

Directions: Projection lamp on d. c. rectifier. To burn projection lamp on d. c. first close switch 1, which supplies the rectifier with a. c.; next close switches 2 and 3, as shown, and start the lamp.

Stereopticon lamp on a. c. This is accomplished by using switches 4 and 5, both of which are to be as shown in diagram.

Both lamps on a. c. Start top lamp on a. c., using switches 4 and 5. This done, open No. 1, leave No. 2 as shown and reverse No. 3. After doing this freeze lower lamp carbons, which will short circuit top lamp. Now to get both lamps on a. c., freeze the top lamp carbons, and pull switch 4 and both lamps are on a. c. The blade of switch 4 must not be allowed to touch either terminal, as it will short circuit one lamp.

Top lamp on d. c., lower on a. c. Reverse every switch opposite to diagram. By doing so you have d. c. on top lamp and a. c. on lower lamp. There is no necessity for opening No. 1. By leaving it in you are ready to switch over again to d. c. on lower lamp and a. c. on top lamp.

Note: It is best to always warm up a new trim on a. c. if you expect to use direct current. A new trim always passes more amperage than an old one, or one that has been warmed up on a. c. You will greatly lengthen the life of your rectifier tube by warming up the carbon on a. c., using switches 3 and 4, reversing them from which position as shown in diagram.

You ask me to comment on this wiring scheme, but I do not think I would care to do that without actually having used it. As nearly as I can figure it out, the plan will work just as you say, but I see no reason for using a. c. on one lamp and d. c. on the other. This would not work at all well on a dissolver, and, as I understand you, the lamps are only used together for that purpose. I very much doubt if the warming up of carbons on a. c. would have much effect on the life of the rectifier tube. It is, of course, a fact that at the instant of striking the arc, when using a rheostat, there is a much heavier rush of current than normal flow. Possibly this might be when using a rectifier. I would not dispute that, Pueblo, but have my doubts as to the matter. I lived in Pueblo a number of years. Left there in 1902. Are G. K. Morris, Joe Glass and Frank Hermond still there?

Old Style Lamp.

Council Grove, Kan., writes:

> This town has 2,700 population, two picture houses and an airdome, the latter playing vaudeville and pictures. Projection is good and business is fine, considering the hot weather. Salaries, however, are exceedingly poor. Am using an Edison Exhibition Model about seven years old, with an old style Edison lamp and may the good Lord forbid that I have to do it again. Get a good clear light, but oh the trouble to maintain it! Where can I obtain a Union card? I am a hundred and fifty-two miles from Kansas City. What is the six months' law? I do not understand it. What is the Union scale of wages in Chicago and New York? My manager declares that six to ten months old films are good enough for so small a town as this. I get them with very poor splices, full of mis-frames and places a yard long where the emulsion is partly scaled off. And then I get the credit for the poor results. Some of the films have no leaders or titles. What is your opinion of this kind of junk? Have been using this stuff for about a week and business is gradually falling off, while a brother operator at another house tells me business is picking up at their place. I bought my handbook of the Wichita Film & Supply Co. Can I get a new handbook at the same place—for I must have one? My picture moves sideways on the screen. The guide rollers at the top of the gate are loose—that is to say, there is lost motion in them sideways. How had I best tighten them?

Surely you are mistaken; two theaters and an airdome in a town of 2,700. Great Scott! You cannot be getting very rich, or else the population of your city are certainly picture fans. Did you not mean 27,000? I should think you would have trouble with a machine seven years old and a lamp presumably of the same ancient vintage. The lamp was a good one in its day, but its day has long since passed. The whole outfit ought to be consigned to the scrap heap immediately. Write to E. M. Hart, General Secretary-Treasurer, I. A. T. S. E., suite 63, 39 W. Adams Street, Chicago, Ill. He will tell you whether you are eligible to the Kansas City Union, or to any other union. The six months' law simply means that you must reside within the jurisdiction of a union six months before being eligible to the union. Many times jurisdiction only covers one city, but sometimes it covers two or three counties or two or three towns. I have a copy of the Chicago scale somewhere, but have not time to look it up now. Ask Brother Hart when you write him. He can easily send you a copy of it. There is no wage scale at this time in New York. Auxiliary to No. 35 had a scale, but the Auxiliary has gone out of existence, therefore, technically at least, no scale exists. My opinion of that particular brand of junk would not look well in print, therefore please do not ask me to express it. I should think your business would fall off, and inasmuch as the business of the other house is picking up correspondingly it is to be presumed that they are using better film. The combination of a seven-year-old machine lamp, and junk film, is certainly a peach. I think we will have to sue your manager for libel on the exhibition business. Don't know whether Wichita Film and Supply Co. will handle the new book or not, but presume they will. However, you can send in $2.50 any time now and the new book will be sent as soon as it is ready. Orders will be filled in the order of their receipt.

Operators' Union.

Zanesville, Ohio, writes:

> Please give me information concerning the Moving Picture Operators' Union, or tell me where I can find out about it.

Call on Frank A. Rait, 303 Greenwood Avenue, Zanesville, Ohio. Brother Rait is secretary of I. A. T. S. E. Local Union No. 104. I think they will accept you into membership. If they refuse, then write to Mr. Lee M. Hart, General Secretary and Treasurer of I. A. T. S. E., suite 63, 39 W. Adams Street, Chicago, Ill. By the way, I am not quite clear on this matter. Where there is no operators' union, but there is a local I. A. T. S. E. union, as I understand it, the operator has the right to join. Am I correct, or am I not? I may have been told this, but if so I have forgotten.

Condenser Breakage.

Lawton, Okla., writes:

> Have had a great deal of trouble with my condenser lenses of late. I break on an average of one pair a week. I take special care in starting the arc and see that no draught reaches the lenses. Have been taking them out daily of late, to wipe them off, as I read in the department this is the right thing to do. Could you tell me what the cause of breakage might be? The only thing I can figure out is that they are of inferior glass, although we get the best on the market. Could it be possible that they cool too quickly after shutting off the arc? They generally break just afterwards.

Condenser breakage, Lawton, is a decidedly tough proposition. I would suggest, however, that you thoroughly clean out the screen and vent holes at the top of your lamphouse, and if there is no local law to prevent, take out the whole back of the lamphouse. Avoid opening the lamphouse door immediately after shutting off the arc. Do not allow the fan to blow directly on the lamphouse. If none of these things remedy the matter, try putting a ring of asbestos between the lens and the metal, so that the lens doesn't touch the metal at any point. Also try closing the vent holes of the condenser casing. The breakage is not due to the poor quality of glass, but probably to the too sudden cooling off of the lenses, coupled, very possibly, with abnormal heat of the lamphouse due to inadequate ventilation.

Out of Focus.

Lake Charles, La., writes:

> I would like information regarding our trouble with poor definition of the picture. We are using Edison Exhibition Improved Model machines, with inside shutter; Edison economizers; Gold Fibre screens, and Bausch and Lomb lenses. We have one straight throw and the other is on an angle. We have 104 volt, 60 cycle

a. c., 7,200 alternations. We use about nine turns of the knob on the economizers.

Theater A—Throw about 75 feet, with a 16-foot picture, two 7½ inch condensers on one machine and one 6½ and one 7½ on the other. Lamphouse about 17 inches from the aperture.

Theater B—Throw about 65 feet. Machine about six feet higher than center of screen. Screen slanted back in proportion. Use two 6½ condensers, which are about ¾ of an inch apart. The other machine has one 6½ and one 7½. Size of picture 20 feet.

We have experimented in every way we could think of, but are still unable to get a perfectly sharp focus, though we had excellent definition before. We were using Pearl White condenser, but ran out of that brand and are now using "perfect" and "Opti." At times we can get a real sharp definition, and in almost every film there will be one or two scenes which are perfect. Should there be a great many people in the scene, the front characters will be in perfect focus and those in the rear will be blurry. We want a new handbook as soon as you put them on the market. We get the WORLD every week, thank you. Find that new springs and aperture plates are a sure remedy for buckling of films, and stops the in and out of focus effect. We have very little ghost trouble. Trust you will be able to help us in the above trouble.

Huh, I hope so too, Larke Charles, but I am not so certain about that. You put up a funny proposition. You have been very complete in some ways—very complete indeed; but in other ways you have not. You say that some scenes are perfect, and then you seem to say that these same scenes are only partly perfect, in that figures in the background are blurry. Now I do not know what to make of that. Also you have very different conditions in the two theaters, and from what I can understand you make no distinction between the two; that is to say, from what you have said the trouble is the same in both houses, and with all four machines. Therefore you see, Lake Charles, I am at a loss to know what to say. If some of the scenes are in sharp focus all over, and other scenes are blurry, then the fault could only lay in one of three things, viz.: (a) Your screen itself moves—which, of course, does not seem possible. (b) The objective lens moves. (c) The film does not pass perfectly flat over the aperture at all times. Now, Lake Charles, I would like very much to help you, and if you will be a little more explicit in the description of your trouble, I think I can very likely do so. First, however, examine your objective lens. Be sure that the tube does not move in the jacket, and that the lenses are themselves tight in their mounts. Further than this, I do not think I could offer intelligent suggestions without more explicit data. If the effect only occurs on the 20-foot picture, then I would suggest the stopping down of the objective lens by a paper ring which would cover possibly one-quarter of the diameter—that is to say, the paper ring being one-eighth of an inch wide. Take out one of the combinations, the front one preferably, and clamp the paper ring in with the lens. If the effect occurs on all four machines, then that is something else again. I await further advice. You presumably mean 7,200 alternations per minute. Yes, new aperture and proper adjustment of tension springs, one or both, usually stop the in and out of focus trouble.

Isolated Plant.

Salem, Mo., contributes the following:

Enclosed find a check for my subscription to the WORLD, without which I do not think I could successfully operate my theater. I entered the field as an exhibitor something more than a year ago, knowing nothing whatever about the business, but thanks to the WORLD and Mr. Richardson's handbook, I have been very successful indeed. Have read with special interest the experiences of exhibitors operating their own electric light plant and will be glad to contribute to the Projection Department my experiences along these lines. In order to get the day service here (the city plant only operating from 6 p. m. to 1 a. m.) I installed my own plant. After a careful investigation I purchased a Fairbanks-Morse plant, consisting of their special electric 9 h.p. engine, and 6 kw., 110 volt d. c. dynamo. This is one of the most complete small plants, I think, any exhibitor can find, as it requires no attention whatever. I have it located in the basement, but the switchboard is in the operating room. It pulls the M. P. machine, three large ceiling fans, electric piano orchestra, and about one hundred lights in fine shape, having ample reserve power for any additional service I may require. The engine consumes nine pints of gasoline per hour under full load. On the city service I was using a Ft. Wayne Compensarc, paying for service at a twelve and a half cent rate. Since installing the plant, I have put in more lights, ceiling fans and an electric piano, and am now running Saturday matinee, still my current costs less than the city service. I will be glad to answer any inquiries for exhibitors.

We are glad to know that the WORLD finds favor in your eyes. Strange how great minds run in the same direction, but we ourselves have an abiding and deep-rooted conviction that the WORLD is a pretty good paper. If you find the old handbook of value, then you will certainly consider the new one a gold mine. You say that your plant "requires no attention." By this, I take it, you mean, of course, that it requires no attention while running. Your letter brings up a point concerning which I have been going to speak of for some time, but have not got around to it, viz.: The purchase of an engine of ample capacity. I think the one great big mistake made by the average exhibitor who purchases a plant is the buying of an engine of too small a capacity. I believe it pays and pays big to have a reserve power in your engine over and above the load you are pulling. The small engine that is working right up to its capacity is, I think, very much more likely to give trouble than is an engine that has a reserve. Work a man or a horse up to the limit of his capacity, and he soon breaks down. I think the same is true of an engine. We are very much ogliged to you for your report, and trust that you will continue to enjoy profitable business for a long time to come.

Several Things.

Kansas City, Kan., writes:

Have not seen anything from Kansas City, Kan., for a long time, and I believe it pays to keep in touch with one another through the department. I have been operating for four and a half years. I notice quite a few of the brothers have trouble with condenser breakage and ghost. Possibly the following may be of some benefit to them. It sure helped me and I think it will help others, if they try it. This is my first experience with a. c. Have been working in this house for a year. It seats 1,250 on two floors. The operating room is in the balcony, located at its front edge, making a 55-foot throw. We have 110 volt single phase, 60 cycle a. c.; two Edison inside shutter machines; have a 2¼ e. f. objective; and a 9-inch e. f. stereo lens. My moving picture is 20 x 24 feet and some odd inches. The very short stereo lens is by reason of the fact that the management want an unusually large stereo picture. We use two 6½ condensers, Keystone brand, which I find do not turn purple, as so many of them do, when using high amperage. My picture was out of focus on the left side for nearly three feet. I loosened the two nuts on the bolt holding the mechanism frame to the case, and, with the machine threaded, put a screwdriver between the frame and case and run off part of a film. When the picture was clear and sharp all over, I put washers on the bolt between the frame and case. On my machine it took washers nearly 3/16 of an inch thick to do the trick.

I remedied condenser breakage by taking off the original lamphouse top and substituting a flat tin top with a hole three inches square. I keep the vent holes in condenser cells closed and have not cracked a condenser for six months. I had a very bad ghost, but I took out the ring that separated the condensers and cut it down so that the lenses would be about one-eighth of an inch apart. The result was—no ghost.

Kansas City gets a little twisted on one or two things, but nevertheless he has accomplished results. Let me say first, Kansas City, that if your picture is 24 feet wide, then it is not 20 feet high, but only about 18. The height of a picture is always three-fourths of its width. I did not understand your placing washers behind the machine at first, but after examining a mechanism of that make I see what has happened. You have altered the relation of the film to the lens by bringing one side of it farther away from the lens than it was before. Now this brings up a matter which I have had in mind for some time, and have intended to ask the department readers to try out. It would amount to exactly the same thing as you have accomplished. It is as follows: Ordinarily the out of focus effect on one side is caused by one of two things, viz.: either the machine itself does not set central with the screen, sidewise, or else the aperture plate is not square with the lens. Of course, if the latter constitutes the difficulty, then the raising of one side of the aperture plate would remedy it, but it seems to me as though the raising of one side of the aperture would also alter the out of focus effect, due to the machine setting to one side of the screen, and this is the thing I want tried out. The idea was put into my mind by a letter, I have forgotten from whom, which came some time ago, stating that the operator had overcome the out of focus effect due to the machine being much higher than the screen, by slipping a piece of tin under the lower edge of his aperture—that is to say, bringing the bottom of the aperture out farther than the top. If it is true that the altering of the set of the aperture plate (which has the effect of altering the distance from the film to the lens at one point, and not at another) will remedy the up and down out of focus effect, then I see no reason why the sidewise out of focus effect could not also be remedied by the same process, and this is exactly what Kansas City has done. Kansas City is not good at letter writing. I had to study considerably to catch his ideas. However, I admire his ingenuity. He is a man with ideas and brains; also he is not of the dog-in-the-manger type who is afraid to tell his brother operator what he has learned, through experience or otherwise. I didn't think, Kansas City, that you could use a 2¼ e. f. lens on an inside shutter machine. The rear end of the lens must come very close to the shutter; also I should imagine your picture would not be very sharp with that short lens. Looking back through the department, you will find that I have published illustrations of the method of ventilating the lamphouse, but there should be a pipe leading from that hole, either to a chimney flue or to the open air, with a swing joint if necessary to allow the lamphouse to move sidewise. There really is no danger of setting anything on fire, but no inspector would stand for an open hole in the top of your lamphouse. Those troubled with ghosts will take note of Kansas City's experience in bringing his lenses close together.

Fuses.

Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

(a) What ampere fuse is required by underwriters, at the branch and at the main cutout, for Power's Six machine? (b) Is it true that for a. c. the machine is fused higher up than for d. c.? (c) What is the voltage at the arc on Power's Six machine? (d) For regulating the current in an a. c. circuit, what other coils are used besides transformers? (e) What coil is used in starting an induction motor? (f) Why is it nobody ever tries to use a reflector or mirror in the lamphouse for increasing the candle power of the lamp?

(a) The Power's Six part of it is superfluous. The underwriters make no requirement, but city law provides you cannot fuse a projection circuit above 45 amperes. (b) If you use a. c. through a rheostat you naturally would fuse higher because you would have to use more current than with d. c. to get equal curtain brilliancy. If a transformer is used, then your fuses might be smaller than if d. c. were used through a rheostat. (c) The same as any other machine. Averages 48 for d. c. and about 34 for a. c. (d) Choke coils. (e) An induction motor is ordinarily operated on a multiphase system. I do not remember just what arrangement is used for starting induction motors, but you can easily look the matter up in any standard work on motors. (f) It would require more space than I can spare to answer this question intelligently, since it involves several optical problems.

BY CLARENCE E SINN

"S. V." writes from a town in Minnesota:—"I am very much interested in the 'music for the picture' column and read it each week. I am present pianist at the C—— theater this city, and use both piano and organ, finding that for dramatic photoplays the latter holds the attention of the audience better than piano music. As I am also manager of the house I hear the comments on same. For years I travelled in vaudeville and of course had to work in picture theaters as well as high-class vaudeville houses. In a large majority of the picture houses in the North, South, East and West, the pianists were very inferior. Since reading your column I am sometimes amused to think of these pianists (?) playing selections from grand opera and the old masters for moving pictures when they were compelled to remain at the theater six hours on rehearsal days to learn to play a topical song in two-four time. I agree with brother H. H. L. of Barry, Ill., that picture players are born, not made, and I will wager that I can get more music out of a piano or organ by improvising and crescendoing from one tempo to another as the scene progresses, than all the concert pianists in the country. I believe I would make a pretty botch of it if I had to turn the pages of certain selections as the scene progresses; the scene would probably change before I had played half a dozen bars. The real player for pictures is the one who has the gift of improvising—or in the slang term, "faking." People do not go to the picture show to hear a concert, but to see pictures. I find that music must not be too conspicuous, but should be correctly played. The patron may not be able to tell you what you played if he is interested in the picture, but should you stop for a moment he wonders at once 'what is the matter with the music.' I find so many pianists who cannot 'fake' but will attempt to play some of the selections referred to, and while stealing a glance at the screen will let out 'blue notes' that jar the patron's mind. I get my story from the Moving Picture World. The music doesn't cause me a thought until I am seated at the piano. I lecture every film—do not merely repeat the titles as so many do, but lecture the pictures so that they are the talk of the town, and I follow every scene with music to suit, yet I don't suppose with these qualities in my favor I could command any more salary than the musician who merrily plays rag-time while the heroine is trying to die. I learned my lesson of playing pictures from playing incidental music with cheap dramatic companies and speak from an experience of 23 years in the business. A parting piece of advice to picture players; study thorough bass and harmony and you won't have to worry about what to play for the pictures tonight."

Our correspondent, with his 23 years of dramatic experience, together with his talent for improvising and abilities as a lecturer, all of which he is enabled (or compelled) to practice by virtue of his position as manager, is better equipped than most of us for accompanying the pictures. I too favor the free use of dramatic music in dramatic pictures (in fact I cannot imagine anything else in such pictures), but our department is wide open for any earnest pilgrim on this new road to share his ideas regarding picture playing. As to the vaudeville theaters mentioned, I know nothing, but I am informed that the picture theaters in the North, South, East and West are constantly working toward a high standard in their picture music. Many excellent pianists are giving their attention to this line of work, and these are finding good dramatic material in the works of famous composers. Though I do not claim to belong to this class, yet I have several times suggested themes from the "old masters" because I could not find anything else so appropriate for the scene in question. Of course one must be sufficiently familiar with the numbers to be able to watch the picture more than the music. Another thing: when suggesting music for the picture it is necessary to give a name to each musical number suggested, and "up to yet" no better plan has been offered than that of giving the titles of standard publications (popular and otherwise). In my own case this is done merely for illustrative purposes, the idea being that the pianist is well enough acquainted with ordinary piano music to know the nature of the music suggested. If he hasn't got these particular pieces in his library he can substitute others of the same character—and they may be improvised or not—just as he sees fit. The best we can do is to give the nature of the predominant scenes. I am not criticizing the brother's letter at all; I agree with most of it except the tag and would like to ask "S. V." if a picture player who was not born but is only in the process of making could really be relieved of all his worries by a study of thorough bass and harmony.

Name and address is withheld from the following: "Would it be right for me to quit playing the pictures on account of several patrons who object to coming to the theater on that account? They like the pictures but do not like the idea of having them played to; they prefer popular music straight through each film. I have been playing here a year and a half and this is the first complaint I have heard. We do a good business here, but my manager thinks on account of the kick he heard that I ought to play straight music right through each picture. There is a house across the street where the girl dopes out anything for her pictures, yet these parties tell my manager her music is great."

The writer wants to know what he should do under the circumstances. What can he do? If he hasn't convinced the patrons in a year and a half that "Oceana Roll" doesn't apply when the heroine is trying to die, what can an outsider say? Of course complaints of this nature come from a thoughtless minority, but your manager doesn't know that. It is a sad fact that though a large number may like appropriate music (presuming you are playing it) few ever say anything either in blame or praise. Your manager is footing the bills; if he insists on popular stuff all through the pictures, I guess you'll have to play it or find another job.

"The Bride of Lammermoor."

"The Bride of Lammermoor" (Cines) is taken from Sir Walter Scott's novel of that name. Donizetti's opera "Lucia di Lammermoor" is also based upon this story, and those who wish to take the trouble can find much that is acceptable in his score. I have before me a copy of "Lucia" (published by G. Schirmer) and will offer the following suggestions from this edition:

1. Introduction to act first; about 16 measures. This will bring you to the combat which calls for a "hurry." A suitable number is found on page 18 (Allegro Vivace) after the huntsman's chorus—until the combat is over.
2. Larghetto (Lucy's song "Regnava nel silenzio") page 32, until "They Exchange Tokens."
3. Larghetto ("Sulla tomba che rinserra") page 46, until "Returning From a Voyage."
4. Introduction to Act 2d. Play as far as the voice; repeat through two scenes.
5. Accompaniment only to "ti rim-pro-ve-ro" (page 64). This is an agitato movement and the first 14 measures are to be used. Repeat until "Lady Ashley Introduces to her Daughter."
6. "Se tra-dir-mi" (page 76) until "The Marriage Contract."
7. This is the famous sextette scene; play "Sextette from Lucia" until Edgar enters.
8. Agitato (may repeat No. 5—page 64) until "Man's Love is of Man's Life," etc.
9. "Tu che a Dio (Page 233) until Arthur enters.
10. Agitato (Allegro Vivace, on page 230) until she kills him.
11. Tu che a Dio" in maestoso style until end of reel.

The numbers are among the best known of the opera and any one familiar with them will have little trouble in following the pictures as given above. The Agitato movements given need not necessarily be taken from the opera; others may be substituted.

JAY HUNT LOSES FATHER.

Jay Hunt, director with the Thanhouser Company, mourns the death of his father, Henry J. Hunt, August 21, in New York City. The elder Hunt, while never engaged in the theatrical or film business, was known to many in those lines, through the long connection therein of his sons, Jay and Philip. The deceased attained the ripe old age of 79.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

NATIONAL LEAGUE BOOMING.

SINCE the close of the National Convention, which was held at Chicago, the president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America has been very busy in arranging to organize new states. The South is enthusiastic and ready to organize. Mr. Neff is arranging to make a trip through the states of Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North and South Carolina and Virginia, starting the latter part of November. A meeting has been called for the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the State of Texas, to meet in Dallas on the 15th and 16th of October, a meeting will be called for the state of Oklahoma to meet and organize some time near the 18th and 19th of October. Kansas and Arkansas are getting ready to organize, and the dates of their meetings will soon be known. There are a few details to perfect before the National President calls these conventions.

The National President and the National Secretary were both invited to attend the Minnesota convention, which met in St. Paul, Minnesoto, at the St. Paul Hotel, on the 4th and 5th of September. Owing to National matters of importance which have recently developed in the East, it was impossible for Mr. Neff to leave his office, as he is directing movements of vital interest to the whole country. Mr. C. M. Christenson attended the convention and assisted Minnesota in perfecting a permanent thorough organization. We now have twenty-two states belonging to the National Organization, Canada having been taken into the League. North and South Carolina, Mississippi and Virginia are knocking at the door.

Mr. Neff contemplates a visit to the East in the near future as he expects to attend the big ball which will be given by Local Branch No. 1 of Greater New York, on the 14th of November. He would be pleased to get in touch with all the Eastern Exhibitors who have no state organization, that a state organization may be formed. Especially the states of Massachusetts, Maine, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Vermont and Maryland. It is time the Eastern states were organized. Many years ago the thirteen states joined together and formed a Union which has become the greatest power in the world. The patriotic sentiment of unjust taxation appealed to the sense of the forefathers of New England in the past and we believe that the exhibitors of New England are not unmindful of the acts of their forefathers, and that they too object to the unjust taxation and commercial interference. It is only through an organization that the Motion Picture Exhibitors of New England can secure their commercial rights and a fair and square deal for all.

The state of Ohio has organized two new Locals through the efforts of the State President: Piqua Local No. 6, and Sandusky Local No. 7. These Locals were both organized on Thursday, September 5, 1912. Mr. Neff anticipated four or five days vacation at Cedar Point, Ohio, but on his arrival at Sandusky, Ohio, he found conditions that needed attention and immediately called the exhibitors together. They all decided to run two reels and organize a local. Mr. Max Stearn of the Exhibit Theater, Columbus, who was former treasurer of the Ohio State League, and who has interests in Sandusky, was present at the Local meeting and assisted in perfecting a thorough, strong working organization.

Cincinnati Local, Branch No. 2, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, held a meeting at the Sinton Hotel at 2 P. M., Tuesday, September 3. They endorsed the new Motion Picture Ordinance for the City of Cincinnati. Arrangements are being made to hold a big picnic in the near future. The Cincinnati Local is now thoroughly organized and most all of the leading exhibitors of Cincinnati belong to the League.

CALL! CALIFORNIA CONVENTION.

The first annual Convention of The Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, State branch No. 12, will be called to order at 10:30 A.M., Sept. 17th, and will continue for three days. A committee will meet the out of town exhibitors at the Hall in Kohler & Chase building, 26 O'Farrell St., San Francisco, and will assist them in making hotel accommodations. One-and-a-third round trip rates have been arranged for on all railroads in California to those who wish to attend this meeting, and every exhibitor in California is urgently requested to attend whether a member of the League or not. You are invited and expected to bring your family and friends, ample provision being made for the entertainment of all. Bay excursions, auto rides and theater parties will be on the program in "The City that Knows How." For the exhibitor there will be a display room which will contain every accesory used in the motion picture industry and where such appliances can be seen in actual use. Remember the date: September 17, 18, 19, 1912.

Respectfully yours,
W. A. CORY,
Recording Secretary.

HON. JOHN J. LENTZ,
Counsel for the Ohio State League, Who Delivered the Principal Address at the Chicago Convention.

JOHN BUNNY RETURNS FROM EUROPE.

Mr. John Bunny, the widely renowned Vitagraph comedian, returned to America August 30, from a three months' picture making excursion to England. The object of the trip was to make an authentic picture version of some of the incidents of Dickens' Pickwick Papers. Mr. Bunny was accompanied by Mr. Lawrence Trimble, in the capacity of director; a cameraman and assistant. The party incidentally visited Berlin and Paris.

American's California Plant

The accompanying picture is the new headquarters of the American Film Manufacturing Company at Santa Barbara, Cal. Originally an ostrich farm, it adapted itself admirably to the needs of a motion picture studio.

The enclosure covers one square block, the interior being divided into corrals which are now utilized for the company's stock of horses, open air studio, etc. In one of the largest enclosures Mr. Dwan has ordered the erection of a typical Western town of the early days, where Western pictures will be enacted in exact fidelity to the scenes of those early times. Other spaces have been put in use for the erection of prospectors' mountain homes, log cabins, etc.

On the advent of the company in Santa Barbara, Mr. Dwan inspected the new place and calling his artisans about him, laid plans for the transformation of the place. A man was dispatched to La Mesa to dismantle and remove the company's property at the old studio and in three days the new place was ready for the production of Western pictures. In the meantime, Mr. Dwan had begun work on a picture, using the excellent scenery in and around Santa Barbara for his backgrounds.

The building shown in the picture is utilized as office, dark room and dressing rooms. On the arrival of the equipment from the former studio, the new open air studio was erected, no time having been lost in the regular production of pictures.

This company produces two full reels of pictures per week. Santa Barbara is yielding new and interesting material every day. The latest find of the property man is an old and historic stage coach of the days of '49. It is the property of Mrs. Emma Greenlee. Because of its historic value, Mrs. Greenlee cannot be induced to sell it, but because she is a moving picture faness she has consented to the company using it in pictures. This stage ran from Lompoc to Los Alanos in 1849. Originally it was the property of F. M. Jeter, and on one occasion Mark Twain and Bret Harte, enroute from Lompoc in search of local color, found it with a vengeance, notorious members of Dick Slade's outlaws holding up the entire party and relieving them of their valuables. Jeter found that concealing express money in a whiskey barrel was not as safe as a water barrel, the outlaws having a fully developed taste for "fire water." The American Company was formally welcomed to Santa Barbara by the Chamber of Commerce.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By G. F. Blaisdell.

WHEN a man of ordinary breeding enters a legitimate theater it is customary for him to remove his hat at the latest before entering the aisle in which may be situated his chair. In case this same theater should follow the lead of so many other houses and put a screen at the front of its stage for the all day and evening projection of pictures why should the same man consider it unnecessary to remove his headgear until he is comfortably seated? That this practice has grown until it is now an evil is an undeniable fact. The responsibility for the existence of this evil is squarely up to the exhibitor. The exhibitor owes it to the dignity of his house, to the dignity of this most popular amusement, and to the respect due to the women who may be under his roof to take adequate measures to enforce the common rules of decency. The commission of this offense is not confined to those unacquainted with the amenities of every-day intercourse. It is perpetrated by antiquated rakes who in the elevator of an office building would be the first obsequiously to remove their hats on the entrance of a simpering typist. If exhibitors will instruct managers and ushers to notify offenders as they enter the aisle to "Remove your hat, please," a necessary reform can be effected in short order.

Moving pictures constitute the chief dramatic entertainment of many millions of people. They form the sole dramatic entertainment of millions more. Any tendency to cheapen, to belittle, this form of amusement should be checked. Any measure that will compel for this popular entertainment the same respect that is freely accorded the more expensive theatricals should be enforced—tactfully where possible, sternly where necessary.

No. 36 of Pathe's Weekly contains a picture that will send the blood bounding through the veins of every man who ever carried a gun as well as of every man willing to carry one. The Kaiser is on a visit to his great and good friend the Czar. They have gone ashore at Port Baltic. The Kaiser is reviewing the Eighty-fifth Regiment, of which he is the honorary colonel. The camera shows the conclusion of the inspection. At the end of the line stand three grizzled veterans. The Kaiser stops and with deliberation chats with each. The rifle comes to salute with a snap. The soldier's jaw is set firmly and you can see the answers to the Kaiser's queries crack from the lips like the bark of a gun. Each man seems to feel that upon his shoulders rests the responsibility of safeguarding the honor of the Russian army and of showing to his honorary colonel, himself the war lord of Europe, that the Eighty-fifth is a regiment of real soldiers. It is a pretty picture—as intimate as it is inspiring. It shows the human side of the Kaiser; it will appeal to every soldier man in every country who sees it.

"Turn about is fair play." There is proof of this as interesting as the experiment is novel in the report from Medford, Ore., giving the results of the turning over of the Isis Theater on Sunday mornings to Harry H. Tuttle for his Baptist Bible class. With the use of the theater were also given the services of the orchestra. On the first Sunday the attendance at the Bible class was over 100—men, too. This is double the usual attendance. The results may have interest for those Sabbatarians who are growing gray puzzling over how best to get the men to attend divine service. There is one factor in the Oregon situation, however, which will cause some of them disquietude: The attendance at the picture shows later in the day was materially increased.

The Treasury Department at Washington has instructed customs officials to "require exporters of films and similar articles to state in their declaration on invoices whether or not any of the articles covered by the invoice are pictorial representations of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition." Films containing representations of combats with pistols, swords, stillettos and other murderous weapons as heretofore will be received with open arms. Nor is anything said by the Washington authorities in regard to a ban on films wherein is depicted the administering of poison with murderous intent or the taking of poison with suicidal intent. It is not here contended they should do so—this is simply an effort to point out the silliness of the legislative opposition to the pictorial representation of a performance which the United States Government, in its Navy Department, not only distinctly encourages but defends.

The whole agitation is of a piece of the pernicious, paternal, petticoated legislative blunder which took the "canteen" from the army posts—and very naturally sent many a soldier seeking diversion from the monotony of barracks into resorts that were not respectable—were, in fact, disreputable.

The inability of some actors to bear in mind their pictured surroundings was well illustrated in a recent release. It may be a drawing room scene, yet the impression—subconscious it may be—that it is the studio seems to be ineradicably instilled in the minds of some actors. If an envelope is opened, bang to the floor it goes, along with the strip torn from the end! It is a satisfaction to record, however, that there are many less offenders in this regard than formerly.

The specific incident in mind occurred in Powers' strong drama "Life's Lesson." The friend of the husband has escorted the wife to the opera, and the two have returned to the wife's home. They are seated in the sumptuously furnished drawing room. The friend takes out a cigarette and asks for a match. A maid brings him a matchbox, a paperboard affair; the guest removes a match, ignites it, returns the box to the maid, and lights his cigarette. The match? It is thrown to the drawing room floor—just as carelessly, as unconsciously, as if the smoker were seated in a barroom!

Those members of the photoplay press and of the National Board of Censorship who have been the recipients of the courtesy of D. W. McKinney at the offices of the Film Supply Company will regret to hear of his taking up new duties—regret that they are to be deprived of his genial companionship and expert skill. The regret is personal. It is tempered by the knowledge that his new place will furnish Mr. McKinney a wider field for his talents—by the knowledge that it is in the line of promotion. The scribes and the censors will heartily join in congratulations to Mr. McKinney and to his employers—the Great Northern Film Company.

The reverential and impressive work of Duncan as the padre in Selig's "The Little Indian Martyr" recalls his similar interpretation of the monk in "The Vision Beautiful." Also worthy of high praise is the little fellow who carried the title role. Only once did he betray a second's consciousness of the camera—and he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt on that. The writer saw the film twice in two days. Like all good pictures—those having behind them applied brains—the second viewing was more enjoyable than the first.

Miss Cecile Guyon, the brilliant young French star, who is working with the Eclair Paris Company, is the despair as well as the admiration of M. Jasset, the director-in-chief of the Paris Eclair feature productions. She will work in pictures only as the spirit moves. To the importunities of M. Jasset that if she will respond more frequently to the demands of the studio she can draw ten times the salary, the reply is always the same, and with it M. Jasset must find his consolation:

"No, I work only as I like; but you know in pictures I work only for Eclair."

A Long Island woman who began going to picture shows in March, of 1910, in an effort to get rid of a nervous complaint contracted the picture habit to such an extent that she now believes she holds the record for her neighborhood for regular attendance. She claims to have seen 820 shows since she began. Her "treatment" long since ceased; she goes now for pleasure.

The more the merrier! At least, let us so hope. On September 23 Edison will add to the list of Licensed releases its fifth in weekly output. On September 26 Vitagraph will make it "six a week." This will be the record up to date for an American manufacturer; also, if the writer be not mistaken, it is the second in the world—Pathe of France, according to latest reports, turning out seven reels each week. These figures, of course, are intended to apply to the production in one country. The Pathe American firm, as is well known, issues four releases each week.

These additions mean that Licensed exhibitors—if it so be their exchange arrangements permit them—may now have their choice of forty pictures each week. Thoughtful followers of pictures will closely observe the results of increased production—inspired, perhaps, by the fear of deterioration in the quality of the output. Candor compels the admission that so far the increase has not been marked by any retrogression in the standard of the plays. There is no reason why the quality should not be maintained if with each additional release there be commensurate addition to the working force.

The prime requisite in the manufacture of six reels a week is just the same as for one reel a week—and that is brains—judgment, common sense; the keen perception necessary to disclose a film for which the junk pile yawns and the moral courage there to consign it before it gets even to the censorship board; the careful selection of scenarios, the intelligent picking of mature actors and not overloading the company with untrained dolls or very young men whose only qualification is that they are respectively "pretty" or good-looking; and the thousand and one essentials necessary to the continuous production of good pictures. All companies sometimes produce a good picture. Few there are who four times out of five will put out a good one.

Added to the forty releases in the Licensed division, the Independents are now putting out regularly each week forty-one—twenty-one through the Film Supply of America and twenty through the Universal. To these forty-one will shortly be added the one each week by the Broncho and the Keystone and also the Ambrosio. And these eighty-three or eighty-four take no account of the output of the multifarious concerns springing up all over the country. There is one thing that picture manufacturers may paste in their hat: There is in the United States right now more room for high-grade pictures than ever before. And here's another to go with it: Some manufacturers are not doing the work of which they and their plants are capable. One inane picture will offset two corking good ones.

These additions to the weekly release schedules have peculiar significance to present and prospective scenario writers. May the time come—and come soon, as it should—when a good single-reel scenario will bring $500. Lest there be any misconception on this point, the writer herewith states that his interest is purely impersonal. He has never written a scenario. The more good pictures he sees the more he is disinclined to attempt it.

"THE CONFEDERATE IRONCLAD" (Kalem).

Here is another Kalem war picture that will interest the lovers of the strenuous in the motion picture. These Kalem war stories have become decidedly popular among moving picture enthusiasts, and a war story with a railroad supplement should be doubly interesting.

In this story is told a bit of history happening during the war of the rebellion, which has been surrounded by a number of interesting events in which a young Southern officer, Lieutenant Yancey, his sweetheart Rose, and Elenore, who plays the part of a girl spy in the employ of the Union Army, figure prominently. The ironclad in this case is one which is being constructed in secret by the Confederates, the location of which is earnestly sought by the Commander of the Union forces. Not knowing that Elenore is a spy, Lieutenant Yancey shows her where the ironclad is being built and Elenore promptly discloses the location to the Union officers, who plan an expedition to effect its destruction. Lieutenant Yancey learns of these plans and writes to inform the Confederates of the attack so that they may protect themselves. The officer in charge of the construction of the ironclad informs him that he is helpless, as he has no powder, whereupon Lieutenant Yancey hastens to secure the necessary ammunition. The train is hastily loaded and with the assistance of Rose, the Lieutenant manages to escape the opposing forces of Union cavalry and urges his engine to the relief of the builders of the gunboat.

In the meantime, Elenore the girl spy attempts to intercept the ammunition train by setting fire to a bridge over which it must pass. Yancey is wounded in his flight, but Rose rises to the necessity of the situation and drives his engine on to its destruction. In passing over the burning bridge one of the cars catches fire, but Rose succeeds in uncoupling it and escaping with the rest of the ammunition which is finally delivered to the defenders of the ironclad. With this assistance the Confederate ironclad is able to beat off the Union gunboats, which attempted to destroy it. The victory having been won, Lieutenant Yancey generously permits the escape of one of the Union officers and Elenore the spy.

The sensational riding, a spirited battle between the contending forces combine to form a picture of absorbing interest. It is seldom that more action is crowded into a single reel than is shown in this picture.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"ROMANCE OF THE COAST" (Lubin).

General Director Barry O'Neil claims this to be his greatest coast story. It is full of romance and wonderfully descriptive of the dangers encountered by the fishermen of the villages that line the capes and coves of Maine. One scene came very near to being a tragedy. Miss Ethel Clayton was marooned on a rock, her boat having broken loose. The tide was coming in rapidly and the breakers were so fierce that rescue was a matter of great risk. For half an hour the water was up to the young woman's waist and the spray continually hiding her from view. The terrible scene was caught by the camera and became a part of the picture story.

Seeking locale for stories, Harry Myers leaves his home at Rocket Castle to live among the fisher folks near Pond Cove. At the start of his stay he falls in love with Ethel.

Scene from "A Romance of the Coast" (Lubin).

daughter of Dick Drayton, a lobster fisherman whose cravings for drink cause him to mistreat his daughters, Ethel and Beatrice. In his love-making with Ethel, Myers incurs the enmity of Charles Cogan, who has forced unwelcomed attentions upon Ethel. When Ethel's father learns of Myers' infatuation for Ethel, he orders him away from the cabin. Likewise he discourages a love affair between Beatrice and a fisherman. Due to their father's indolence, Ethel and Beatrice are forced to go out alone in their fishing punt and set the lobster pots.

One day Ethel goes forth in the punt without Beatrice. She moors the boat on a rock, half a mile off shore, where pots have been set. While she is pulling in a pot, the boat becomes dislodged and drifts away. It is flood tide and Ethel is left alone on the rock, absolutely helpless; slowly the incoming tide covers the rock, while Ethel screams wildly for assistance. Myers, from the window of his room in Pete Wright's cabin, catches sight of the figure on the rock. Hurriedly he ascends the elevation on the promontory at Two Lights, climbs the ladder-pole there, and with the aid of the telescope definitely makes out the figure of the woman. He runs to Ethel's home, and from Beatrice learns that Ethel had gone alone.

Down to the beach rushes Myers. Here Cogan's punt is moored. Myers starts to leap into the boat to go to Ethel's assistance. But Cogan refuses to let him in. While the two men fight for the possession of the punt, the water climbs higher and higher around the half-submerged rock where Ethel has been marooned. Myers knocks out Cogan, leaps into the boat and frantically rows to Ethel's assistance. He reaches her just as the waves have climbed to her chin. Numbed with cold, terrified by the shadow of death that has hovered over her, Ethel is dragged safely into the boat, while the assembled villagers, on shore, applaud his bravery. When Ethel has recovered, Myers asks her hand in marriage, and discloses his identity. Ethel's father, completely transformed by the horrible danger to which the girl has been exposed, approves the match. Myers then takes Ethel to his castle by the seashore, and shows her the future home.

"SWEET ALICE BEN BOLT" (Imp).

Songs that never die generally make excellent themes for an idyllic motion picture. Many of these have been done by various companies and mostly with success, much of which is due to popular sentiment in favor of the song. There is something romantically poetic about them that seems to inspire the actors and directors in their work, and the result is usually a picture of much feeling and delicacy. As a general rule the producer finds it necessary to enlarge upon the original theme for the sake of action. That, of course, is a matter of poetic license or picture license as one chooses to view it.

"Sweet Alice Ben Bolt" is no exception to the rule; in fact it would be difficult to produce a picture based upon the song without the addition of some dramatic continuity. The picture begins as a juvenile subject, showing Ben Bolt and Sweet Alice as children of a bygone age. Therefore it is a costume play and a very pretty one. The numerous children appearing in the scenes are dressed according to the Colonial period, all of which lends much charm to the scenes in which they appear. The later scenes deal with the fortunes of Alice and Ben Bolt after they are grown up.

The story opens showing Ben Bolt and little Alice on their way to and from school and the beginning of their affection for each other. In later years Ben Bolt a strong and handsome young man is still the lover of Sweet Alice, courting her ardently as of yore. They plan to be married and receive the blessings of Ben Bolt's parents, Alice having none of her own. But their dream of earth's highest happiness is rudely terminated when Ben Bolt is impressed without notice to serve in the British navy on a frigate that is short of hands. Alice, learning of Ben Bolt's seizure, attempts to rescue him with a sail boat, which she intends to steer alongside the frigate that Ben Bolt may escape. However, in sailing the vessel she is struck upon the head by the boom of the sail as it swings around. Hanging unconscious over the gunwale of the boat, she is observed by the sailors on the frigate who send a boat to her assistance. The girl is taken aboard the frigate and revived, and there she learns that there is no hope of saving her lover. Worrying over the sad turn of their affairs, Alice loses her reason. She is put ashore in a hostile country and finally is placed in an asylum where she is well treated by the foreign people.

Ben Bolt for some years cruises with the frigate until it finally returns to the shores where Alice had been left. The mission of the vessel is one of war, but upon its arrival it is found that the ship has run out of water. It becomes necessary for them to send a detail to shore with casks to obtain water, even at the risk of capture by the enemy. The presence of the sailors is discovered by the asylum keeper and his wife who immediately notify the garrison and a sharp skirmish results in the capture of most of the sailor squad. Ben Bolt is left lying supposedly dead on the ground. Though seriously wounded he revives and staggers aimlessly along the road until he comes to the asylum where Alice is detained. At the sight of Ben Bolt her reason returns and, now being free from the British navy by virtue of being practically a prisoner of war, Ben Bolt decides to remain there with Alice and they are happily married with the sanction of and blessings of the asylum keeper and his wife.

"FOR HER LORD" (C. G. P. C.).

The Marquis de St. Gilles, Lord of Chalfonte, is accused of conspiring against the French Republic and a warrant is issued for his arrest. Learning of this he asks Durat, one of his tenants, to secure a passport, which will enable him to escape to England. When the document is acquired, Durat's daughter pleads for permission to deliver it to St. Gilles. Her father reluctantly admits that this is the safest method. The girl delivers the passport and urges St. Gilles to flee, as the soldiers with the warrant are at the gate. She disguises herself in the marquis's apparel and he escapes through a window. The soldiers enter, produce the warrant, and march away with the bogus marquis. Passing the royalists' rendezvous with the prisoner, the arresting convoy is attacked and the prisoner's release effected. When the trouble is over and the marquis is allowed to return to his estate, he makes the brave girl his bride. This historical episode makes an interesting film, which is well acted and full of action. It will be released September 13th.

On the same reel is "The Late Harriet Quimby's Flight Across the English Channel." The aviatrix is shown accomplishing her most notable flight and as she appeared before she met her tragic death, a short time ago.

ACTRESSES SUBMIT TO HEALTH TEST.

Director Fred Thomson, in making a scene for a Vitagraph Life Portrayal, on board one of the Floating Hospitals, was very much surprised when Miss Julia S. Gordon, who played the lead, entered the boat with Adele de Garde were stopped by the Health Officer, who asked, "What's the matter with them?" and was told, "Moving Pictures." "Put them down as "Rickets," said "Doc." He gave them a thorough examination, their heads a fine-tooth-combing and applying the different lotions necessary to disinfect and remove any form of animalculae. The actress was speechless, but in order to give realism to the scene, she had to submit and poor little Adele had to follow her example. Those who aspire to become moving picture players may get a few pointers from this incident and appreciate the difference between acting on the stage and in moving pictures. Nothing like the real thing, you know!

"BILLY McGRATH'S LOVE LETTERS" (Essanay).

This is another humorous adventure of Billy McGrath, the popular character-creation featuring John Steppling, Essanay's widely known and jovial comedian. The plot is deliciously original and entirely out of the ordinary.

Billy McGrath and Kitty Reese are fond sweethearts and engaged to be married. While going over the plans of a new bungalow they are interrupted by Eleanor, Kitty's small sister, who manages to make scrap paper of the precious plans before they can prevent. Billy lectures her severely and Kitty sends her from the room. Eleanor is terribly downcast, watches Billy as he leaves the house and declares she will get even with him. Next day Billy and Eleanor are playing tennis. Finding some of her big sister's prettiest lingerie and a prettily decorated garter, Eleanor puts them in the pocket of Billy's coat, lying out on the lawn and awaits developments. Kitty discovers the terribles in his pocket and, not recognizing them as her own, breaks off her engagement and Billy is ordered from the house by her infuriated father while Eleanor chuckles with glee. A little later Eleanor finds a packet of Billy's love letters out on the lawn, where Kitty has been going over them tearfully, and decides to play "postoffice" with real letters. Consequently the precious missives are distributed to every mail-box on the street by the little mischief-maker, and it is not until later that Kitty misses them and is told by Eleanor of their whereabouts. In horror Kitty rushes to Billy, informs him of the matter, and an excited chase up and down the street follows. Most of the neighbors are found reading the tender epistles, and they are only turned over to the lovers after much merriment at their expense. However, the last one is finally recovered and Billy takes Kitty home, where the affair of the lingerie is straightened out when the repentant Eleanor confesses she put it in Billy's pocket for revenge.

John Steppling is exceedingly funny in his popular role, Miss Beverly Bayne plays Kitty charmingly, Joseph Allen portrays old Reese and little Eleanor Kahn is a real Captain Jinks as the mischief-maker.

The production contains many exquisite summer scenes and is portrayed with fine conception of comedy values and vigorous action. It is booked for release September 13th.

"BRONCHO BILLY OUTWITTED" (Essanay).

The world-wide popularity of Essanay's Broncho Billy series is not to be denied, and this is another unique plot featuring Mr. G. M. Anderson in the character-role he has made a by-word throughout two hemispheres.

Old Silas Trent, a squatter, is warned that the community is not healthy for those of his calling and to move out. Trent is furious and vows vengeance on any that try to interfere with him. Meeting Walters, one of the ring-leaders, Trent becomes involved in an argument that ends by his being knocked down. Leaping up he whips out his gun and wounds Walters in the arm and escapes to his cabin. Walters hurries to town, informs Broncho Billy, the Sheriff, and Broncho at once starts for Trent's shack. Meanwhile, Trent tells his pretty daughter, Vedah, of the affair and, knowing her father will be pursued, she strikes upon a novel scheme to save him. Getting the old man into bed, she cuts off her long hair, arranges the strands under a night-cap she places on his head and cautions him to remain perfectly quiet. A few moments later Broncho rides up, dismounts and calls her out. Vedah pretends ignorance of her father's whereabouts and tells Broncho she is alone with her sick mother. Broncho searches the shack and, failing to identify Trent in the clever disguise, apologizes for the intrusion and leaves. However, he has been struck by the simple charm of the girl and stops outside to roll a cigarette. Fearful for her father's safety, Vedah determines on another scheme, goes to the stable, entices Broncho there through trickery, locks him inside, then aids her father to escape across the border on the baffled Sheriff's bronco. On being released Broncho is furious, but his anger melts away before the calmness of the girl and, realizing he has been cleverly outwitted, he wrings her hand, lifts his hat and starts up the trail toward town on foot, while Vedah gazes after him admiringly.

It is with the deepest regret the Essanay Company announces this is the last production Miss Vedah Bertram appeared in, prior to her untimely death following an operation for appendicitis on the morning of August 26th, at Oakland, Calif. In the short time Miss Bertram played with Mr. Anderson in Essanay's Western productions she won hosts of warm friends, and her loss is mourned throughout the entire film world. "Broncho Billy Outwitted" will be released Sept. 14th.

BRAND NEW JOB FOR STREYCKMANS.

Well-Known Picture Publicity and Promotion Man Joins the Mutual Film Corporation Staff.

The Mutual Film Corporation has added to its staff H. J. Streyckmans, who has resigned from the New York Motion Picture Co. to accept the position. Mr. Streyckmans has been with Baumann & Kessel for more than two years, and is one of the few men in the moving picture business who couples a thorough knowledge of the business in all its branches with ability as a writer.

In choosing Streyckmans the Mutual Film Corporation is following its policy of engaging none but the highest class men for its executive staff. The board of directors of the Mutual is composed of successful business men, occupying high positions in the commercial and banking world, and the progress of the company has been built upon solid foundations. Streyckmans is noted for his aggressiveness and quick wit, and in the recent trouble between the Universal and the New York Motion Picture Co. it was the daring work of Streyckmans and "Doc" Willat which saved the plant when the doors were broken in and an attempt was made to eject them. The New York Motion Picture Co. is still in possession of the plant.

MR. H. J. STREYCKMANS.

When Mr. Baumann learned that Wm. H. Swanson had left for California to endeavor to take the Bison Pacific Coast studios, Streyckmans was hurriedly sent after him, and by quick work made connections with fast trains which landed him a few hours behind Swanson, though the latter had a forty-eight hours' start. The plants were fortified with armed men, and Streyckmans directed the legal proceedings which resulted in the Bison properties remaining with Baumann & Kessel.

Mr. Streyckmans was formerly editor and manager of The Show World, a Chicago theatrical publication, and the organizer of the International Projecting and Producing Co. The independent movement was practically extinct at that time, and Streyckmans made a sensational tour of the country, holding meetings of exhibitors and establishing agencies.

When Baumann & Kessel organized the Reliance Co., Streyckmans was engaged to exploit the new product as well as Bison, Itala and Ambrosio films. It is said that the Reliance Co. broke all records in securing standing orders for its first releases. In handling these interests Streyckmans published a house organ called "Film Fancies," a beautiful, well-edited booklet which attracted considerable attention.

BERNHARDT IN LA TOSCA.

It is announced that the Universal Features has secured a notable subject in a production of the tragedy "La Tosca" with Sarah Bernhardt in the title role. We have seen Madame Bernhardt in two noteworthy picture productions, so that the coming of this new effort arouses no little curiosity. The subject is said to be up to the highest standard of the art and it certainly is one calculated to give full scope to the powers of the divine Sarah. The date of release has not been announced.

KEYSTONE RELEASES THROUGH MUTUAL FILM COMPANY.

The Mutual Film Corporation will make the first release of Keystone films, for which it holdes the exclusive agency for the United States and Canada, on Monday, Sept. 25, with a split-reel comedy, "Cohen Collects a Debt" and "The Water Nymph."

The leading parts in Keystone films are played by Mack Sennett, Mabel Normand, Ford Sterling and Fred Mace, supported by a strong cast. This quartet comes to the Keystone Co. from the Biograph, and their work is well known throughout the world. Mr. Sennett continues as director.

MR. MACK SENNETT.

Shortly after Sept. 25 two reels of Keystone will be released, the reel made by Mr. Sennett and a dramatic production by another stock company, of which full particulars will be given when release dates are fixed. The Keystone comedy on Monday will always consist of two snappy subjects.

EXHIBITORS BALL COMMITTEES APPOINTED.

Committees to arrange for the annual ball of the New York Motion Picture Theater Exhibitors have been appointed as follows:

Committee on Publicity: M. Needles, Arthur Jacobs, Mr. Coufal, L. Rosenthal, Ed. Valensi, R. C. Whitten, Mr. Eckman, William Allen and L. Germain.

Committee of Arrangements: Sidney Ascher, F. E. Samuels, H. W. Rosenthal, Grant W. Anson, Mr. King, Mr. Goldfarb, Frank Allen.

Committee of Ways and Means: A. Coleman, M. L. Fleishman and Mr. Eckman.

Reception Committee: Samuel H. Trigger, F. E. Samuels, Adolph Bauerenfreund, Arthur Jacobs, R. L. McNabb, Ed. Valensi, Sidney Ascher, Grant W. Anson and L. Rosenthal.

FLICKERS.

Mr. F. H. Trifts, proprietor of the Gem Theater, St. John, New Brunswick, Canada, called at the offices of the Moving Picture World while visiting in the United States last week.

Mr. Gaumont is expected to arrive from Europe about the end of this week, and will be found at the plant of the Gaumont Co., in Flushing, L. I.

D. W. McKinney has picked up the load that was dropped by Ingvald C. Oes. Mr. McKinney has assumed charge of the Great Northern Film Co. during the absence of Mr. Oes, who is now in Europe for a stay of about six weeks, at the home office of the company which he represents here.

I stepped in to shake hands with Mr. Saunders, manager of the Universal Film Exchange, 111 East 14th St., and was surprised at the number of operators waiting for their reels. The Universal Exchange has increased their standing order to fourteen extra reels per week, in order to supply their fast increasing list of new customers.

The friends of Harry Raver, general manager of the Film Supply Co. of America, will be pleased to learn that he is back on the job again, after being confined to his bed for more than a week. Though not entirely free from the effects of his illness, Mr. Raver is able to spend a couple of hours each day at his desk.

Mr. B. Nichols, representing the M. P. Sales Agency, of London, Eng., was a caller at this office last week.

Having outgrown its old quarters on the tenth floor of 145 West 45th St., the Feature Photoplay Co., H. A. Lande, proprietor, has moved its office and effects to the seventh floor of the same building, and will hereafter occupy the old offices of the Mutual Film Corporation.

Mr. F. Magidson, representing the National Ticket Dispensing Machine Co., called at the offices of The World and demonstrated to us a new automatic ticket selling machine which will be on the market shortly. This machine is the most simple but practical device of its kind I have seen.

C. R. Plough, of the Anti-Trust Film Co., Chicago, Ill., is in New York City at present, and can be located at the Prince George Hotel.

Mr. Fleckles, manager of the Chicago branch of the Laemmle Film Service, is in New York City for a few days.

Ever since the Reliance Film Co. started to give away souvenir twenty-dollar goldpieces, through their sales manager, C. Lang Cobb, this worthy distributor has been carrying a cane. It may be that Cobb sometimes imagines he is giving away real money, and thinks the cane is becoming to a philanthropist. MAC.

"MAX'S TRAGEDY" (C. G. P. C.).

Max Linder, the famous author-comedian, is shown in another of his own sketches, which deals with a love affair having a touch of tragedy to it. Max's father wishes him to marry a girl whom he believes would make an ideal wife. Max is stage-struck and declines the proposal, but his father is insistent and Max is forced to accompany him to the home of the young lady. The girl, too, is stage-struck, and when she learns that a young man in quest of her hand is to call she makes herself as hideous looking as it is possible for a very pretty girl to be. The same idea has dawned upon Max as the procedure most likely to discourage the young woman and leave him free to follow his dear art. The plan succeeds so well that Max's father believes the case hopeless and leaves the girl's house with his son on his arm. However, the old gentleman has forgotten something and back to the house he goes. The young people meet again, off their guard and without disguise, and the change in their appearance gives each a delightful thrill. And leave it to Max. When he discovers the girl is in reality a beauty, it does not take long for him to convince her that they were made for each other. The marriage takes place in due course and, after it, a scene of tragedy that gives Max an opportunity to display a branch of his art which will prove to his many admirers to be a delightful surprise. This film will be released Sept. 20th.

On the same reel are views of The Edmunds Klamm Ravine, a beautiful spot in beautiful Switzerland.

A NEW "ZIGOMAR" PICTURE.

The accompanying illustration represents a scene in "The Phantom Bandit," the new Zigomar picture that the Feature & Educational Film Company, Cleveland, O., are now putting on the market. It is a sensational subject in four reels and is being handled as a State Rights proposition.

"THE ARIZONA LAND SWINDLE" (Bison).

When the unscrupulously dishonest land promoters sang praises about the wonderful West and the vast fortunes to be made, hundreds of thrifty farmers in the Middle West sold out their holdings and invested in what they had supposed to be the land of promise.

The thieving swindlers had not anticipated that the farmers would seek to settle on their possessions so quickly, but when they saw the hundreds of families start for the West they hastily dispatched a messenger to warn their pals and to order them to protect the only fertile soil available and the sole watering place.

After weeks of traveling, weary and footsore, the cattle and women almost famished by the long march, the big caravan of prairie schooners, etc., arrived at the place designated by the defrauding land concern only to learn that they had been swindled and that the mecca they sought was an unfertile, barren and uncultivated country.

They present their claims to the agents of the swindlers only to be hooted and laughed at. The situation had become serious. The drought had left the land hot and dry and sickness had set in among the emigrants. Desperate, the settlers determined to force the issue, only to be met by a band of cutthroats and hired bandits.

Adams, a scoundrel who headed the murderous band of swindlers offered to give them water if Strong would give him his pretty daughter in marriage. Though she would sacrifice herself to save her family and her friends, Jack, her sweetheart, proves himself a hero by a dare-devil ride for the sheriff and a posse, who arrest the outlaws. The picture was released September 3.

Founded upon a dramatic incident from one of the season's big fashion shows. In one scene in the picture, over $5,000.00 worth of the latest imported gowns and hat creations are used, as properties. The exceptional story and clever action make this a real worth while feature. About 1,000 feet.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 17TH.

THE BRAND BLOTTER

The "Brand Blotter" is a romance of the ever lovable, virile Colorado cattle country. Pictured in picturesque locations from an excellent story and replete with vivid dramatic action, this should prove one of the best Western subjects of the year. About 1,000 feet.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 19TH.

INTO THE GENUINE

An exceedingly dramatic story of the board of trade and the inconsistency of our so-called modern society. In this, the greatest board of trade picture ever produced, over one thousand motion picture exhibitors take active part in the realistic "pit" scene. Produced at the Selig Studios in Chicago, during the afternoon of Aug. 14th, while the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Convention visitors were present. DON'T FAIL TO DEMAND THIS BIG FEATURE FROM YOUR EXCHANGE. About 1,000 feet.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 20TH.

Life and Customs of the Winnebago Indians

The proud and haughty tribe of Northwest Indians known as the Winnebagos, have been made the subject of a most interesting and picturesque educational picture which shows the games, dances, manners and customs of these famous red-skinned people. About 1,000 feet.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

LUBIN.

THE SLEEPER (Sept. 16).—Dave Ryland, an old prospector with a grub stake leaves his wife and grandson to seek his fortune. After a month in the hills his grub runs low, during which time he has not been able to strike anything or communicate with his wife. She, in the meantime, has been dispossessed by the landlord.

Two drunken cowboys see old Dave asleep and, being full of whiskey, determine to play a joke on him by locating a claim beside him while he is asleep. They build a monument and write out a location notice. Old Dave wakes up and finds that his hand falls upon one of the richest pieces of ore he has ever seen. Robert Adair, meanwhile, has found old Dave's wife and grandson and taken them into his home.

Dave rushes into town, but has not sufficient money to record his claim. Robert, who happens to be in the vicinity, assists him, taking him to his home, where the old people are re-united. Robert assists old Dave in developing his claim, which turns out to be one of the wealthiest mines the country has ever known. Ten years later we see old Dave and Bob giving a little banquet celebrating the tenth anniversary of the discovery of "the sleeper."

WHEN FATHER HAD HIS WAY (Sept. 18).—Billy Ware is in love with Kitty Devoe. On his way to the park to keep a tryst with Kitty, he steps on the tender toes of a middle-aged gentleman, who declines to accept Billy's apologies. Passing on, Billy meets Kitty, proposes and is accepted. The two go off to Kitty's home in order that Billy may meet Kitty's parents, who are as yet strangers to him. Billy is impressing Mrs. Devoe with his good manners when Kitty's father appears. He proves to be the irascible gentleman on whose toes Billy trod in the park.

After Billy has gone Kitty tries to pacify her father, but with no success. Kitty goes to Billy's home and explains matters to him. Billy's sister has a scheme and suggests a plan to bring Kitty's father to time. Following her suggestion, Kitty returns home and informs her parents that Billy has thrown her over. Mr. Devoe is at first pleased, but when Kitty refuses to eat, he gets uneasy, and finally decides that since he started the trouble he will end it by hunting Billy up and compelling him to marry Kitty. Billy is elated to find that Kitty's father has risen to the bait, but to carry out the bluff refuses his demand. Mr. Devoe then uses a more forceful argument in the shape of a six-shooter, and marches Billy off to the city clerk's office for a marriage license, then to a jeweler's for a ring, and finally to secure a clergyman. Kitty has been advised by telephone of the turn of events and is ready when the three arrive. Billy acts with aversion to the proceedings. As soon as they are married, however, he changes front, kisses Kitty and astonishes his father-in-law by embracing him warmly.

A CHILD'S DEVOTION (Sept. 19).—Laddie, the little son of a widower, worships his father. The father is in love with a good and beautiful woman and asks her to be his wife. He tells Laddie that he is to have a new mother and is surprised when the boy is grief-stricken. After the marriage, the new mother tries to win Laddie's love, but her efforts are a failure.

A baby sister comes to Laddie's home after a while and out of love and pride for it, Laddie unbends a little towards the mother who owns it. But the little sister dies, and the mother, ill and delerious, stretches out her arms and calls unceasingly for her baby. Laddie sees and hears her and his heart is so touched that he determines to get another one for her. He starts out to find one and in the park, seeing the mother of many children, is surprised when she refuses to spare one, even when he offers his watch in payment. But Laddie finds a baby in a carriage outside of a house and wheels it off. He takes it to his mother and when her empty arms are filled, she quiets down and peace comes to her. Laddie leads his father to the house where he got the baby and the distracted parents are assured that they will get their baby back. They see that their baby is safe and leave it where it is. Laddie's mother later gives up the baby and once more has empty arms, until Laddie creeps into them and is cuddled to her heart where he finds happiness.

TURPENTINE INDUSTRY (Sept. 20).—This picture is educational and will interest those who wonder where it comes from. Most of us, however, know that turpentine comes from pine trees, but unless you have been through the forests of Virginia, Georgia or Florida, have little idea as to how it is tapped from the tree. The picture shows the work, by convict labor, which is customary in the South. A section of the bark is chopped off and the turpentine oozes out and drips into pails. The clarifying is also shown in the picture, and finally the use as applied by the painter and varnisher.

NO TRESPASSING (Sept. 20).—Geo. Engle, surveying on a country road, sees Mabel Long pass by. He is infatuated, but unfortunately, Mabel has heard him address his assistant in very forcible language. Mabel meets her uncle at the entrance of their place and shows a letter from brother Jack that he is coming home next week on a leave of absence. Engle's duty takes him surveying on the Long's place. In spite of a "No trespass" sign, Long and the hired man capture him up in a tree. Long goes for an officer. Later they get an axe, but Mabel pretends fainting and in the excitement Engle escapes. Later brother Jack arrives and recognizes Engel as an old chum, but Mabel declines an introduction. Proceeding thoughtfully in the neighborhood of the tree she bumps into a cow tethered there. Frightened, she climbs the tree. Engle sees her and hurries to the rescue. He imposes the condition that she marry him if he rescues her. Long and the hired man see him and come on the run. Mabel yields, and when shown that the cow is tied is indignant. Long and the hired man assault Engle and dire things are about to happen when Jack arrives, introduces and explains. Uncle says "Yes" and all is over.

HIS PAIR OF PANTS (Sept. 21).—Enthused by the warm weather, Mr. Horatio Smith yields to his wife's entreaties to dig up the back-yard truck garden. He gets half way through his work before he sees that he is soiling his pants, and he goes to the garret, dons a pair of overalls and leaves his pants up there and his month's salary. While he is digging the garden, an old clothes peddler calls at the front door. Mrs. Smith sees a chance to get some money for buying garden seed and sells the pants Smith left up in the garret.

Poor Smith discovers the truth and he and his wife hurry frantically after the peddler. They sweep down upon him and scatter his clothes right and left before he can explain to them that he has just sold the pants to a tramp. Mr. and Mrs. Smith leave the indignant peddler and continue the search after the tramp. Meanwhile the hobo has put on the pants in a convenient shed nearby, has discovered the roll of greenbacks, and is spending Smith's wad right and left on ice cream and peanuts for kids. About this time the Rev. Jones, a minister, hurriedly leaves his house with a pair of pants that he has to have pressed, which are an exact duplicate of Smith's, and he is overtaken by Smith and his wife. Smith, in his excitement, declares the minister has his pants and tries to pull them away from him. They are ripped in two, and the minister and Smith begin hitting each other with the two halves. A cop separates the combatants and is just about to arrest them when Smith sees the tramp down the street. The tramp has come out of the saloon, gloriously drunk, and is throwing Smith's money to a big crowd of men, women and children. Smith the minister, the cop and Smith's wife rush up to the tramp, but he sees them coming, and the crowd chase him down the street. The tramp, during the chase, crawls through a wire fence. It is not until he stumbles and falls into a shallow pool of puddle water that the cop and Smith can lay their hands on him. Smith then discovers, to his great grief, that the pants are not only ruined, but that not much of his money is left.

ECLIPSE.

A COUNTRY HOLIDAY (Sept. 18).—Bang! crash! bang! and the boys, Tom, George and Jack, are off for a week's vacation in the country. They arrive at the farm, and immediately start out to enjoy themselves to the best of their ability, at the expense of everybody and everything on the premises.

One day a popular actress appears upon the scene, and it does not take long for all three young fellows to fall head over heels in love with her. After considerable effort, they manage to obtain an introduction, and then each plans to outdo his rivals in the competition for her affections.

The actress rather enjoys the sport and tries to divide her favor equally. After allowing each one in turn to believe himself the favorite, she writes a separate note to each, accepting his proffered heart, and requesting him to meet her at a certain place the next morning at seven o'clock.

After vigorous preparation, the three suitors, flushed with triumph, come by separate ways to claim their reward, and each is astounded to meet his rival, but no lady.

While they are impatiently waiting, and arguing over the situation, the object of their affections waves exultingly at them from a passing railway carriage bound for London.

NEW PLYMOUTH (Sept. 18).—Located on the west coast of the northern island of New Zealand, the town appears exceptionally picturesque, sloping down to the ocean front, with a background of forest-clad mountains in the distance.

CINES.

TRADITIONAL CUSTOMS IN SOUTHERN ITALY (Sept. 17).—With the greatest zeal and solemnity, the villagers of Laino gives its annual representation of the trial and death of Christ, attracting great crowds of people from the neighboring countryside.

All the incidents are shown, including the trial, condemnation, scourging, the crown of thorns, the march to Calvary, and the crucifixion, in a very impresive manner, and are made more interesting by the fact that they are enacted in the midst of beautiful mountain scenery.

A GUN FACTORY (Sept. 17).—This is an instructive as well as interesting subject. We are taken on a trip of inspection through these immense works, where the giant engines of war are manufactured. The whole process is shown, including the melting of steel in the furnaces, boring, lathing, rifling, and the transportation of the finished product to the cars.

AMALFI, ITALY, AND SURROUNDINGS (Sept. 17).—Located on the Gulf of Salerno, not far from Naples, Amalfi is one of the most picturesque towns of all Italy. The film spreads before our eyes scenes along the coast, and later many beautiful views of the town, from the Capuccini Hill.

KALEM.

THE PARASITE (Sept. 16).—Fred Adams leaves to join the Mexican insurrectos. During his first battle he is wounded and left on the field to die. Benson, an adventurer, finds he is an exact double of Adams and decides to impersonate him. Changing clothes with the wounded man and appropriating his papers, he goes to Adams' home and presents himself to the soldier's sister, Madge, masquerading as her brother. With Madge, Benson is received in the homes of the best people in the city and this gives him an opportunity to ply his trade, that of a sneak thief. Rose, one of Madge's friends, receives a birthday present—a handsome pearl necklace—and Benson pays court to the girl in an endeavor to secure the jewels. His efforts meet with success but his true identity is discovered and the Parasite gets his deserts.

IN PERIL OF THEIR LIVES (Sept. 18).—A California fisherman starts with his family for a trip up the coast. When the party finds a desirable location, the girls begin to gather shell fish while the men ply their trade. When the fishermen attempt to return, their boat is wrecked in the surf and they are caught in the rocks.

As evening comes on the gurls leave for the camp and are startled by hearing a gun shot. They investigate and find that a hunter, bitten by a rattle snake, has fired to attract attention. The girls assist the hunter to dress his wound and as they depart they sight the fishermen imprisoned on the rocks. With the assistance of their newfound friend they succeed in rescuing their relatives.

CHIPS OFF THE OLD BLOCK (Sept. 20).—Bill and Jim quarrel over politics but they are separated by friends and sent on their way. It happens that they are not the only ones who have had trouble. Tommy and Bobby, two school boys, are disorderly and the teacher gives each a note to take to his mother, instructing the parent to call and decide what punishment shall be given the lad. Tommy, fearful of the future, bursts into tears just as he meets Jim, who pacifies the lad by saying that he will impersonate the mother. Bobby meets Bill, who volunteers to act as the boy's parent.

At the school house the make-believe mothers recognize each other and the old quarrel is renewed. This offers the boys a chance to take up their argument and the horrified teacher has the time of her life endeavoring to restore peace and quiet.

TILLEY'S BIRD FARM (Sept. 20).—A remarkable institution at Darien, Conn., which supplies most of the zoological gardens.

At first we are shown the strange marabou stork and the bar-head geese and Crown Pigeons from Australia. The British government forbids the exporting of the latter on account of their rarity. We see the flamingo from Egypt; the stork reputed to be 100 years old; white-faced tree ducks from Madagascar; cranes from Germany, a Japanese domestic fowl, secretary birds from Africa and the rare snow geese.

THE GRIT OF THE GIRL TELEGRAPHER (Sept. 21).—Betty's fiance, a railroad detective, is called out of town on private business and leaves his handcuffs in the care of the girl telegrapher. Shortly after the detective's departure Betty receives a message to be on the lookout for Smoke-Up Smith, a notorious thief—a full description being given. Smith appears at the station, feeling assured that he will not be recognized and engages quarters at a nearby boarding house.

Betty, fully convinced that Smith is the person described in the message, slips the handcuffs into her pocket and goes over to the boarding house, where the happy-go-lucky thief is playing "blind man's buff" with the young boarders. This gives Betty an opportunity to slip the irons on Smith and he immediately shows his true identity by the disturbance he causes, ere he is imprisoned in the station.

Smith manages to escape and, entering a locomotive, speeds down the track and out of the yards. Betty, however, discovers the flight of the thief and hastens to another engine, prevailing upon the engineer to steam up and follow in pursuit. A thrilling chase takes place and the criminal is captured.

THE BEACH COMBERS (Sept. 26).—Russell applies for a position in the bank, but is refused because of his shabby dress and apparent lack of refinement. Passing along the street he finds a purse and, while searching in it for a clew to the owner, is accosted by the latter and accused of pocket-picking. A policeman is called, and, rather than be arrested, Russell flees and the mob gives chase. Arriving at the beach exhausted, he tells of his plight to an old beach comber and his daughter, Bess, and is protected by them. He falls in love with Bess, and becomes a beach comber. Russell finds a bottle floating into shore, which reveals the hiding place of a fortune. The beach combers are jubilant over the find and decide to give up their occupation and live comfortably. But soon after making a few purchases, including an engagement ring for Bess, Russell learns from the newspapers that the $30,000 was stolen from a bank. He notifies the bank authorities, who come to the little cabin and are given all, even the ring, which, however they refuse to accept. It is back to beach combing for the little family, but they are at least happy because they have been honest. It is not very long, however, before a bank official arrives with a check of handsome denomination and offers Russell a better job than he was once refused.

ESSANAY.

THE RANCHMAN'S TRUST (Sept. 7).—Jim Boulder, a ranchman, receives a letter one morning, from his old friend and chum, George Stapleton, a New Yorker, saying his son Elliott, is coming out to the ranch to pull himself together and to take good care of the boy, above all to keep liquor from him. Next day Elliott arrives and immediately falls in love with Boulder's pretty daughter, Sue. She returns his love and thus arouses the insane jealousy of Bill Dunham, the ranch foreman. A month pases and Bill, discovering that Eliott's weakness is drink, manages to smuggle a bottle of liquor into his room, thinking the young fellow will disgrace himself. Eliott finds the bottle, but resists the temptation and demands to know of Boulder who put it into the room. Boulder confronts Dunham, accuses him, and the foreman confesses. Boulder discharges him. Next afternoon Dunham finds Eliott and Sue together and attempts to kill the young Easterner. However, the bullet lodges in the boy's shoulder, creating a painful but not dangerous wound. Sue has him carried into the house by the boys, then Dunham's gun is found on the spot and the boys start in pursuit of the cowardly ruffian. An hour later Durham is brought back at a lariat's end and Boulder is about to have him hanged when Eliott spares his life by declaring him too big a coward to die. Riding Dunham to the creek that marks the state line, the boys drive him across it at gun's point. Some weeks later Eliott and Sue are married in the little town church, and ride off down the trail amidst a shower of rice and old shoes thrown by the gay cowboys, while the hills re-echo the sound of their six-shooters popping in honor of the event.

A WOMAN OF ARIZONA (Sept. 10).—Jim Hardy, a prospector, lives with his pretty wife in a rough hill shack. One morning, as Hardy is preparing to drive to town, a ragged stranger appears and begs for a bite to eat. Hardy takes him in and, while he hitches the horses, his wife feeds the man who gives his name as Dixon. Hardy drives him into town, gives him some money from a well-filled purse, and Dixon's eyes shift craftily as he thanks him and leaves. Planning to bite the hand that fed him, Dixon now hastens out on the trail, arms himself with a rock, waits for Hardy to drive by, knocks him senseless, secures the purse, and escapes. Some cowboys find Hardy who gasps out his story; the sheriff is notified and starts in pursuit. Dixon is cornered, but with a bullet in his arm he manages to reach Hardy's shack ahead of the boys, and deceives Mrs. Hardy into believing he was wounded while protecting her husband from a posse. She dresses the wound, gives him a revolver and sends him away. A few moments later the boys arrive with Hardy and she learns the truth. Waiting only long enough to see that her husband is well taken care of, she arms herself with his Winchester and starts out on Dixon's trail. Trapped by the surrounding posse, Dixon is battling them from behind a tree when Mrs. Hardy sees him from the trail above. Her gun cracks and Dixon staggers back and sinks to the ground with a bullet through the gun arm. A moment later the posse grab him and hustle him away, while Mrs. Hardy hastens back to the arms of her husband with the purse of money.

THE LISTENER'S LESSON (Sept. 12).—The Simpkin Sisters of Green Valley are two old spinsters, who are very much in love with Jonathan and David, two country boobs who own adjoining farms. Everything is splendid until the spinsters advertise for summer boarders and two dashing girls, Isabel and Clarice come out from the city. Jonathan and David immediately fall in love with the girls, and a great flirtation begins that drives the poor spinsters to desperation. At the barn dance the city girls break up the gathering when they set the whole crowd to doing the "Grizzly Bear" and "Texas Tommy" swings, and the Simpkin sisters hike for home in disgust. Next morning Isabel and Clarice are told to leave the house by the enraged spinsters. Securing quarters in the town the girls write to Jonathan and David, explain matters and declare that if they will sell their farms the wedding bells will chime. Immediately Jonathan calls up David, and explains that if they can sell their farms they will have a double wedding. Now the Simpkin sisters are "rubbering" over the phone, and think the boys are speaking of them. So the old girls hasten to town, and, to quicken matters, buy the boys' farms through the dealer. Then they sit down to await the proposals. But, of course, the boys receive their money and, a week later, start for town to meet the girls. They are seen by the old spinsters, who joyfully think the boys are on the way to get their marriage licenses and follow them. But the boys meet Isabel and Clarice in the justice's office, the double wedding is performed, and the happy couples come out just in time to meet the Simpkin sisters face to face. Of course the boys eye them coldly, and proceed joyfully on their way, while the poor old souls sob out their grief at being thus fooled on each other's shoulders.

BILLY McGRATH'S LOVE LETTERS (Sept. 13.)—Billy McGrath and pretty Kitty Reese are fond sweethearts engaged to be married. In going over the plans of their new bungalow they are interrupted by Kitty's litle sister, Eleanor, who manages to destroy the precious plans and is sent from the rom by Billy. Eleanor plots revenge and next day while they are playing tennis on the lawn, puts some of Kitty's lingerie in the pocket of Billy's coat. Kitty finds it, breaks off her engagement, and her father drives Billy from the premises. A little later Eleanor finds a packet of love letters that Kitty has left on the lawn and decides to play "post office" with them. Consequently the precious missives are distributed to every mail-box on the street. Kitty misses them and is told by Eleanor of their whereabouts. In horror Kitty rushes to Billy, informs him of the matter and an excited chase up and down the street follows. Most of the neighbors are found reading the tender epistles, and they are only turned over to the lovers after much merriment at their expense. However, the last one is finally received and Billy takes Kitty home, where the affair of the lingerie is straightened out. The broken engagement is renewed once more.

BRONCHO BILLY OUTWITTED (Sept. 14).—Old Silas Trent, a squatter, is warned that the community is not healthy for those of his calling and to move out. Trent is furious and vows vengeance on any that try to interfere with him. Meeting Walters, one of the ring-leaders, Trent becomes involved in an argument that ends with his being knocked down. Leaping up he takes out his gun and wounds Walters in the arm, then escapes to his cabin. Walters hurries to town, informs Broncho Billy, the sheriff, and Broncho at once sets out for Trent's shack. Meanwhile, Trent tells his pretty daughter, Vedah, of the affair, and, knowing her father will be pursued, she strikes on a novel scheme to save him. Getting the old man into bed she places a night-cap on his head, cuts off her long hair, arranges the braids under the cap, and cautions him to remain perfectly quiet. Broncho arrives, dismounts and calls Vedah out. She pretends ignorance of her father's whereabouts, and declares she is alone with her sick mother. Broncho searches the shack, fails to identify Trent in the clever disguise, apologizes for the intrusion and leaves. Struck with the simple charm of the girl he stops outside to roll a cigarette. Fearful for her father's safety Vedah now entices Broncho out to the stable, locks him in, and aids her father to escape on Broncho's horse across the border to safety. On being released Broncho is furious, but his anger melts away before the calmness of the girl, and, realizing he has been cleverly outwitted, he wrings her hand, lifts his hat and starts up the trail to town on foot, while Vedah gazes after him admiringly.

THE GOVERNOR (Sept. 17).—John Meade, the retiring governor, is an honest, fearless reformer. He sees that his friend Waring is elected as his successor. Waring is not a strong character and his new office goes to his head. Nolan and Deems, party bosses of the worst type, recognize the new governor's weakness and play on it with flattery. Nolan introduces into Waring's service, as stenographer, Margaret Ward, a girl who is under obligations to Nolan, because he has befriended her family.

Charles Waring, who becomes his father's secretary, is suspicious of the two bosses and suspects the new stenographer. Nolan and Deems father a certain traction bill in the legislature. It is a bad bill and it means a great deal to them financially. It is passed and sent to the governor for signature. At this juncture a telegram is received from Meade urging the governor not to sign the bill until he, Meade, can come with evidence that the bill is a steal. Margaret hears Waring announce that he will veto the bill and telephones to Nolan about it. Nolan and Deems come in hot haste to use all their wiles to make the governor sign the bill at once.

Charles discovers Margaret in the act of telephoning Nolan, and accuses her. She breaks down and comes to see that she has acted wrongly. Charles tries to get Meade by telephone, but finds that the former governor is playing golf some miles away. Margaret, eager to make amends for what she has done, tells Charles to keep his father from signing the bill while she takes the governor's motor car and sets out to find Meade.

Charles enters his father's office as Nolan and Deems are appealing successfully to his pride. Charles upsets the inkwell over the desk but even this fails for Nolan snatches the bill away before it is damaged and Deems is ready with a fountain pen.

Meantime we have seen many flashes of Margaret's motor car ride. At the critical moment she gets Meade to the executive offices. Meade bursts in upon the scene followed by Margaret, and after seeing the proof, Waring vetoes the bill, banishes Nolan and Deems and clasps hands with Meade in the old friendly way and Charles comforts the self-blaming Margaret.

LAZY BILL HUDSON (Sept. 18).—Bill Hudson's wife is a devout church goer but Bill would rather be in bed Sunday mornings and turn over to have another sleep. One Sunday morning Mrs. Hudson arises and wakes up Bill to go to church with her. He simply turns over. She dresses and before leaving reproaches him for his lack of religion. He listens to her lazily and goes to sleep again and Mrs. Hudson goes to church alone.

An hour later he looks out of the window and sees the boy leave a Sunday paper on the front stoop. He goes down stairs in his pajamas, makes a quick dash out of the front door to get the paper when lo! the door slams and Bill finds himself locked out. He tries to open the door in vain. His predicament suddenly becomes worse when he sees his wife, with the minister and several others returning home from church.

Bill makes a wild dash for the rear of the house and with the aid of a ladder starts to re-enter his bedroom. Mrs. Hudson and the minister get a glimpse of the strange figure on the ladder and conclude it is a burglar. They send for the policeman, who climbs the ladder to arrest the supposed burglar, but Bill resents the policeman's attack and a battle royal ensues in which Bill is badly battered up by the policeman who is dragging him out in triumph when he is recognized by the frightened Mrs. Hudson and her neighbors. They have difficulty in convincing the policeman that he is not a burglar, but after due explanations the policeman apologizes and Bill promises to be good and become a better church member in the future.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, VIRGINIA (Sept. 18).—In the National Home for Disabled Volunteered Soldiers at Hampton, Virginia, the United States maintains a resting place for these men who have earned a nation's gratitude, which will creditably compare with similar institutions in other countries. The beautiful grounds are situated on the water overlooking Hampton Roads, where the famous battle between the Monitor and Merrimac was fought fifty years ago.

The life at the home is shown in picturesque detail and we were fortunate enough to obtain views of the last Memorial Day celebration, this being naturally the most important day of the year for the veterans. Their parade and review, the decoration of graves in the cemetary, the salute to the dead—all these are things which the average person does not see in real life and will therefore enjoy seeing on the screen. Many of the veterans are very feeble and their ranks are thinning fast, but they all march with the true martial spirit.

HEARTS AND DIAMONDS (Sept. 20).—While spending a few months in London, Betty Hunter and Miss Whitcomb, her spinster aunt, become acquainted with Harry Russell, a special European agent in the U. S. Customs Service. Betty and Russell learn to love each other, but a series of interruptions prevent his intended proposal of marriage even up to the night prior to her sailing for America.

Since meeting Betty, Russell had written to Washington requesting to be transferred to the New York office. The morning that Betty and her aunt are to sail Russell receives a letter granting his request for transfer, to take immediate effect. He hastily prepares to sail on the "Troy" which is to carry his sweetheart home.

The American Consul at London, takes advantage of Russell's sailing to have him watch one James Black who is also to sail on the "Troy" and of whom word has come from the continent that he may be a diamond smuggler.

Black gets a chance to show Miss Whitcomb a little courtesy, thereby making himself acquainted and receiving an introduction to Russell and Betty upon their return from a promenade on the deck. Russell recognizes the name of the man he is to watch and Black's attentions to Betty give him a double reason for wishing to land his man.

He at once begins to watch for some tangible evidence of Black's being a smuggler and is rewarded by seeing him in his stateroom preparing a specially made jewel box to be thrown overboard. He gets into wireless communication with the U. S. Revenue Cutter Service officials in New York and the "Mohawk" is sent to meet the "Troy" off Sandy Hook.

In looking for the launch which contains his confederates, and which is to pick up the box of diamonds, Black again comes upon Russell and Betty just in time to spoil another of Russell's attempts to propose.

The interruption is short however, for within two hours an exciting chase between the revenue official's boat and the smuggler's launch has resulted in the capture of the latter, unknown to Black. Consequently he is greatly surprised when, while walking nonchalantly down the gang plank, he is taken into custody. Once he is out of the way Russell decides to wait no longer, proposes and is accepted right on the dock.

THE GRANDFATHER (Sept. 21).—Old Jim Elliott's life was not pleasant after he came to spend his remaining days on the farm with his son. His daughter-in-law's coldness and lack of consideration for the old man was the cause. She knew nothing and cared less of his record from '61 to '65—when he fought with the famous "Fighting Sixth." To her he was merely a lame old man who had to be fed and cared for.

The love that grew up between the old soldier and Jennie, his litle grandchild, was his only source of happiness and when the announcement of the annual township picnic came it was Jennie who helped him brush up his old uniform for the occasion. Judge Williams, from up state, was to speak and Jennie wanted grandfather to look his best. But grandfather was not to go. At the last moment Jennie's mother gave the old man's seat in the buckboard to a neighbor's child.

Sitting alone, grandpa nursed his disappointment, for it was keen. Suddenly an auto drove in—a stalwart soldierly old man alighted and inquired the road to the picnic grounds. Old Jim gave the desired information—a look of recognition passed and two old comrades clasped hands that had not met in fifty years.

Judge Williams (for it was he) was to speak at the picnic—but as he and old Jim fought battle after battle over and over again the picnic was forgotten until finally the chauffeur called his attention to the time. He insisted upon his old friend accompanying him and they arrived an hour late, but greeted by the cheers of the waiting assemblage.

Jennie's mother was thunderstruck at sight of her father-in-law and was more than ever embarrassed when the judge eulogized him from the platform.

After lunching together the old fellows strolled off for a chat on the bank of the lake. Little Jennie and the boy who had usurped her grandfather's place in the buckboard played on the rocks beside them until Jennie fell into the deep water. In a moment grandfather's coat was off and he had plunged in, saving her only after a bitter struggle.

The shame of Jennie's mother was great when she learned of grandfather's heroism, but she was womanly enough to repent of her past smallness towards the old man and make amends.

BIOGRAPH.

STERN PAPA (Sept. 16).—Papa is fearful of having his daughter on his hands, so schemes to get her married. To the first intended bridegroom papa offers every encouragement, but he balks. This failing, he tries other tactics—that is, offering stern objections to the next candidate for son-in-law honors. Did the plan succeed? The picture will answer that question.

LOVE'S MESSENGER (Sept. 16).—The French cook and the maid are deeply in love with each other, and, finding it hard to pass as much time as they would like in each other's company, the cook devises a means for transmitting love notes to the maid in a most unique manner—that is, inserting the note in a biscuit specially marked. Fine, until the boss gets the biscuit with the note and thinks it is intended for his wife.

TWO DAUGHTERS OF EVE (Sept. 19).—Calumny is one of the most despicable crimes against our neighbor, and while the wife in this story acted conventionally, she nevertheless maligned the other woman simply because of her profession — an actress. While out on a shopping tour, the wife and her husband enter a store, leaving their little child in the auto in the care of the chauffeur. This gentleman pays but scant attention to the child, so the little one wanders off and strolls into the stage door of a theater during the matinee. The parents upon their return to the auto discover the child's absence and trace him to the theater stage, where they find him in the arms of one of the show girls. The mother snatches the child from the girl's arms, scornfully exclaiming, "How dare you contaminate my child with your touch?" For this remark, together with the derisive laughter it occasions, the girl vows to be avenged.

VITAGRAPH.

CAPTAIN BARNACLE'S WAIF (Sept. 16).—Tommy is bright and good-looking and he attracts the notice of a lady in a London slumming party. While she is talking to him, he steals her watch and chain. The loss is discovered and the police get on Tommy's track. A pal warns him. He pawns the watch and gets out of London. Wandering off into the country he is met by a tramp who, seeing him count over the money, takes it from him and knocks him down. He is left half-dead beside the road. Captain Barnacle and Bunce, driving home from the village, find the waif and Barnacle takes him home. Ruth bandages his wounds and gives him food and they let him sleep on a couch in the kitchen. He attempts to steal some old silver of the captain's. He is discovered and the captain is going to cast him out, when Ruth pleads for him and the captain resolves to give him another chance. Tommy turns over a new leaf and, under Ruth's tuition, improves daily. The captain is called away suddenly to town. That night a fire breaks out in the cottage. Ruth is overcome by the smoke, but Tommy rescues her and in doing so, is struck by a falling beam and mortally injured. He dies, holding Ruth's hand, a smile on his face, bidding her tell the captain he has made good.

THE TROUBLED TRAIL (Sept. 17).—Feeling that his days are numbered, Martha's father writes his old friend, Jim Bessington, that he will send his little girl Martha to him, knowing that she will be well cared for.

Shortly after Jim receives the letter, Martha, now an orphan, goes to Jim's home. Her presence creates gossip and scandal, which Jim overhears and resents in an unmistakable way. To protect her good name, he proposes marriage, with the understanding that he will act as her guardian only, and should she love anyone later, he would release her. The girl accepts this proposition, but finds she really loves Jim, and when he acts indifferently she cannot understand it.

"Happy Jack," a young rancher, thrown from his horse, sees Martha riding through the valley and asks her to assist him. She goes after his horse and brings it to him. Some few days later, Jack has a chance to return her kindness. Martha is bitten by a snake. Jack helps her indoors, where she leaves a note, telling Jim she has been bitten by a snake and gone to the doctor's. Jack lifts her to his horse and rides madly with her to reach the town. They are seen by a fellow rancher, who tells Jim his wife and "Happy Jack" have eloped. This is the awakening of Jim's love for the girl. Furiously grasping his informant's revolver, he jumps on his pony and goes in pursuit of Jack and his wife. After he has gone, the rancher who carried the news discovers the note written by Martha that she was bitten by a snake and gone to the doctor's. He realizes that he has done an injustice to the woman. He jumps on his horse and goes in pursuit of Jim. The chase is a mad one. The ranchman succeeds in lassoing Jim and handing him Martha's note, which explains all. Jim hastens to the doctor's, where he finds his wife. When she opens her eyes and sees Jim, she smiles, for she sees the lovelight in his eyes as he tells her of his happiness, and she tells him of her joy.

A VITAGRAPH ROMANCE (Sept. 18).—Through chance, Caroline Carter, daughter of Senator Carter, and Charles McKay, a young author, meet. They become engaged, very much in opposition to the wishes of her father. Charles follows her, and with the assistance of some of the pupils, he arranges a meeting with Caroline and they agree to elope. On a moonlight night, he enters the grounds of the seminary and places a ladder at the side of the building leading to Caroline's room. He is confronted by a large dog, who is the guardian of the seminary grounds. Caroline throws Charles a box of bon bons, with which he feeds the dog and quiets him. The rest is easy. The two lovers are soon on their way to the parson's, with the good wishes of all Caroline's friends, who cheer them from the windows.

Senator Carter reads in the newspaper of his daughter's marriage and immediately writes her that as she has disregarded his wishes, he hopes she will be able to continue her independence, regardless of him. Charles, to strengthen his exchequer, takes to writing scenarios for moving pictures. His success is not encouraging. While out walking, Charles and Caroline see a moving picture company making a scene of one of their plays. He recognizes the director as an old friend. Charles tells him that he is looking for employment, and the director gives him a card, telling him to call at the Vitagraph Company's studios. Next day they are employed by the Vitagraph Company and Caroline in a short time becomes one of the leading actresses.

Senator Carter in passing a moving picture theater sees the picture of his daughter among the Vitagraph players. He goes inside to see the play and then hastens to the Vitagraph studios. He is introduced to the heads of the company and conducted through the studios in search of Caroline. He finds her in the midst of a very touching scene. Caroline's eyes suddenly meet his. She rushes into his arms. He is overcome with joy at finding her and readily forgives her and Charles. He tells Charles he is proud of him and his independence, offering him a position to take charge of his business and political affairs. Congratulations follow and every body rejoices in the happy conclusion.

THE INDIAN MUTINY (Sept. 20).—Even in far-off India, beauty is coveted. Beatrice Wilson, visiting her brother, a British officer in India, is sought in marriage by a native prince. She refuses him and he plots revenge. He incites the Sepoys to mutiny and they set fire to Jack Wilson's home and endeavor to abduct Beatrice. She is defended by her brother, who in the midst of the excitement is taken captive. Beatrice is seized by the prince. One of his followers takes her in charge. Jack breaks away from his captors, jumps astride a horse, seizes his sister and makes off with her. They are pursued by the prince and mutineers on elephants and horses. An exciting chase follows. Jack, with his precious burden, rushes madly on. He accidentally comes across a regiment of Gordon Highlanders on their way to quell the mutiny. Jack tells his story and the soldiers lay in ambush, awaiting the arrival of the oncoming prince and his savage cohorts. When they reach the place where the soldiers are hidden, they are set upon and ignominiously defeated. The prince is taken prisoner and his followers surrender. Beatrice comes from her hiding-place and confronts the prince, who is furious to find himself so completely mastered. Beatrice, in gratitude, throws her arm about her brother's neck and impulsively extends her gratitude to the captain of the Highlanders.

THE BURNING OF THE MATCH FACTORY (Sept. 20).—Matches were made to burn, but never in the world's history have so many of them been seen burning at the same time. Of course this happening was an accident, and also the taking of the picture. One of the Vitagraph cameramen happened to be in the vicinity when it occurred, therefore we are given one of the closest and most thrilling views of a fire in all its variety and exciting grandeur. One match will make a fire, but millions and millions of them are calculated to raise blazes that would consume the largest city in existence, if not consume the whole world. From this picture we get an idea of what a great conflagration a little match will start and what many more will do, and that it is no trifling matter to play with fire.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE ITALIAN MODEL (Sept. 21).—Strange things happen in the Latin quarter of any city where art and Bohemianism flourish. Aubrey, a young artist, employs a beautiful model to pose for him. During one of the pauses in their work, Aubrey invites her to have a glass of wine with him. Her lover is very jealous of her and follows her to Aubrey's studio. He looks through the window, which is curtained by a heavy portiere. He sees Aubrey pouring the wine and the model talking pleasantly to him. The artist places the glasses of wine upon the table in front of the window. While he and the model are talking, the lover reaches through the window and unseen puts poison in one of the glasses. Aubrey hands her the poisoned glass of wine and she drinks it. A doctor is called and the girl is taken to her home. The young artist is arrested and asserts his innocence. Lambert Chase, the detective, is called into the case and learns that the model had a lover, who often visited her at her home. Chase disguises himself as a woman, visits the model's home and discovers the lover prowling about the house. The lover follows him, hoping to get some information regarding the girl's condition. The detective makes himself known, the lover starts to run, and reaching the end of the pier, jumps into the water, followed by the detective, who, after a terrific struggle, captures him. Later he is brought up for examination before the police. Lambert Chase has arranged the room with a table placed in front of a curtained window to correspond with the conditions in the studio, where the crime was committed. The police cross-examine the accused, who denies all knowledge until at a psychological moment the curtain is thrown aside, a hand reaches through the window and pours poison into one of the glasses. On beholding this, the accused is so horrified and unnerved, he confesses he committed the crime. So the mystery of the poisoning of the Italian model is entirely cleared and Aubrey is acquitted.

THE BANDIT'S SPUR (Sept. 18).—Manuel Garcia, a bandit, has ordered an Indian to make him a pair of spurs and he then refuses to pay for them. On his way home he robs the passengers of the Overland Stage. In escaping, however, he loses one of the spurs and the victims of the robbery bring it to the sheriff. Garcia's daughter is in love with Ed Stanton, a ranchman, who does not take her seriously. She sees Ed embrace another girl and vows to be revenged. When the sheriff is informed of the hold-up she is one of the spectators. Returning home to her father, he tells her he has lost one of his spurs. She recognizes the spur he has as identical with the one in the sheriff's possession. Taking it from her father's boot, she hides it in Stanton's cabin and informs the sheriff where he will find it. The sheriff gathers a posse and they come upon Ed and his sweetheart examining the spur. This evidence is too conclusive for the posse and they take the prisoner away from the sheriff, determined to lynch him. The Indian comes to the sheriff to complain of the theft of the spurs by Garcia and the sheriff thus learns the ruth. He acquaints the posse with this additional evidence just in time to prevent the death of an innocent man.

THE DESPERADO (Sept. 19).—The big man in Copper City is Dick Rand. He owns the town's only bank and his pretty daughter, Jane, acts as cashier. She is attending to her duties when a stranger enters and asks numerous questions, which arouse the girl's suspicions. Late at night the stranger returns, opens the safe and departs with the strong box. Rand hears him, but too late to get a shot at him. The sheriff is aroused, a posse secured and the robber pursued. He has too much of a lead, however, and escapes. When Rand and the posse return to Copper City they find a surprise awaiting them, as Jane, suspecting the stranger, emptied the strong box that night and hid its contents beneath her pillow. The bandit, when he finds he is no longer pursued, sits down to count his golden harvest and to his dismay discovers that he has stolen only some golden lemons.

SILVER MOON'S RESCUE (Sept. 21).—A party of cowboys, on a spree, try to force an Indian girl to take a drink of whiskey. An Indian brave resents this and in the struggle which follows he kills one of the cowboys. The cowboys summon some friends, who capture the Indian girl and bring her to their camp. The Indian chief is informed of what has happened, and taking a force of his warriors, he goes to the white settlement. The story has an usual ending, for, after a rattling good fight, the Indians succeed in rescuing the girl and bring her home with them.

THE ELOPEMENT (Sept. 17).—This film is inspired by the series of famous paintings by John Lomax, which tells the story of a maid who disregarded her father's objection and eloped with the man of her choice. Each of the delightful characters is faithfully reproduced and an additional charm added by their animation.

GERONE—THE VENICE OF SPAIN (Sept. 17).—A Spanish town where boats take the place of taxicabs, as beautiful as the famous Italian city.

MAX'S TRAGEDY (Sept. 20).—Max Linder, the author-comedian, is shown in another of his own sketches. This one includes a tragic scene and the manner in which it is handled will prove a revelation and a delight to his many admirers.

THE EDMUNDS KLAMM RAVINE (Sept. 20).—Some views of a beautiful scenic wonder in beautiful Switzerland.

AMERICAN.

VENGEANCE THAT FAILED (Sept. 11).—A decidedly unique subject that will charm. Centering about the efforts of an unscrupulous band of thieves to make away with dainty Claribel Wilbur. A subject full of ginger, replete with adventure and fine situations. A picture that all the family will enjoy.

THE GREASER AND THE WEAKLING (Sept. 2).—On the death of Mrs. Burgess, her two daughters came home from the East. The ranch foreman paid his respects to the widow, and incidentally lost his heart to pretty Mabel. Claudine, the other sister, found herself beset by Jim Bradley, but little suspected that Jim was the victim of a cunning Mexican's tongue. They planned—Jim and the Mexican—to marry the girls and obtain control of the ranch. How they failed, and how Cupid played the leading role, makes a Western subject of extraordinary power and appeal.

THE MARKED GUN (Sept. 4).—The outlaw's daughter warned her father of the coming of the sheriff just a moment too late. The result was that two bandits were slain, although the father escaped. The sheriff, returning home, celebrated his son's birthday by giving him a revolver taken from a dead bandit—a revolver bearing a peculiar mark about the butt. The son, Dave, went out for a ride the following day and was shot by the rober chief and his men. They took the marked revolver, and when the sheriff finally captured them, he found the odd revolver on the dead man. Meanwhile, Dave had been rescued by the outlaw's daughter, who, when her father failed to return, carried a letter from Dave to his father. What followed makes the out-of-the-ordinary in Western pictures.

THE STRANGER AT COYOTE (Sept. 5).—Bill Buckley ran things his own way at Coyote. He induced Jim Williams, sweetheart of pretty Mabel Hoyer, to get drunk and commit some outrages not worthy of Jim in his better moments. Then a stranger came and promptly fell in love with Jessie Williams, sister of Jim. How the stranger brought order out of chaos, and what he did to the bully makes an interesting subject. Bill Buckley tried to kill the stranger and met his own end in trying to do so.

THE DAWN OF PASSION (Sept. 9).—Away off, miles from civilization, lived Margy Cotter and Jim Walthers. Their respective families were the only ones for leagues about. Then a party of cowboys arrived and the leader awoke the first faint dawn of feeling in the pretty, almost primeval, Margy Cotter. He died a violent death, that careless cowboy, and by the hand of the almost primeval man, Jim Walthers.

RELIANCE.

CALEB WEST (Sept. 18—Reel 1).—Henry Sanford, a civil engineer, has a contract to build a lighthouse at Keyport. He employs the services of Captain Joe Bell and his well trained sailors, and of Caleb West, the master diver. Caleb has a young wife who, when left alone while Caleb is at sea, finds her life monotonous and lonesome. Bill Lacey, a handsome young seaman at work at the ledge, has his eyes on Betty, and constantly makes overtures to her, which at first she repulses. An accident to the boiler of the sloop employed in the work cripples several of the men, and Lacey is badly wounded. Betty, with the other women in the port, is summoned as nurse, and Lacey becomes her charge. Lacey makes the best of his opportunity and plays upon her sympathy. Pity for the suffering man and the unaccustomed position of responsibility awakened new feeling in Betty, and when Lacey is again well, she finds her old position in the humble cabin intolerable. A note from Caleb saying that the work at the lighthouse would keep him away from home some time longer, decides her and she goes away with Lacey. Caleb, returning from his work, finds her gone, and reads her note of explanation.

Reel 2—Betty grasped at the idea of elopement with Lacey as a means to get away from her lonesome life at the ledge. Arriving in the city, she becomes frightened at Lacey's ardent love-making, and when in his madness he uses force, she rushes away from him. She goes to Sanford as her only refuge. Sanford, at first bitter against her, softens as he hears her story and he takes her to the home of a friend of his—Kate Leroy—who gives her refuge for the night. A telegram brings Captain Jo on the scene. He gladly forgives Betty and takes her home.

Caleb forgives his wife, but thinking that she will never be happy with him, refuses to take her back. He is lonesome without her, and she equally unhappy lives her own life at Captain Jo's. She takes a position in a store, so as not to be dependent on Captain Jo. In returning home from work one evening at dusk, she is accosted and insulted by Lacey. In her terror she screams and Caleb, who has made it a habit to follow her himself unseen, rushes up and falls upon her assailant, while she runs home. Caleb begins to feel that Betty really needs him, and decides to take her back. He goes to Captain Jo and tells him that he has come for Betty. The Captain, overjoyed, brings the penitent young wife in to her forgiving husband and leaves them in the happiness of their reunion.

THE REDEMPTION (Sept. 21).—Ellen receives a letter from her brother Bob, who is in prison, telling her that he will be free in a week and asking her to meet him. She does so and prevails upon him to go home with her. He refuses to meet her husband, desiring to defer it until he has "made good," so the husband is kept in ignorance of the fact that his wife has a brother. Ellen's little girl takes a fancy to Bob and the clandestine meeting are happy times for all three. The husband blows cigar smoke rings around the child's head and the brother follows suit, using a cigarette. It is a half-burnt cigarette found by the husband that first gives rise to suspicions of his wife's unfaithfulness. These suspicions are later confirmed by the child's prattle about liking the other man's smoke ring better than his. He finds a note from the brother, telling her the clothes she gave him proved a good fit and that he would be there the next day to bid her goodbye. He returns from his office in time to find his wife in her brother's arms and many tense dramatic moments follow before the situation is cleared up, and husband and brother are reconciled.

MILANO.

THE WEDDING GIFT (Sept. 14).—Renee, the dashing widow of a Parisian shopkeeper, is madly infatuated with a young attorney, Raoul, and blindly believes that her affection is returned. On the contrary, however, Raoul has long been engaged to a charming little tailor maid, who is only postponing the wedding ceremony until she can complete the trousseau which she had planned. This has proved a slow and disheartening task for Gina, the little seamstress, for her savings are small, and so, when an artist entreats her to pose for a head which he is painting, she is glad to earn the extra money which this will mean.

One day Renee's chum, Olga, sees a photograph of Raoul in a locket which her dressmaker wears, and by adroitly questioning the girl, learns that she and Raoul are soon to be married. Olga hurries to Renee with the news of her discovery. Swearing vengeance, Renee has Gina watched, and learns that the seamstress is often seen coming from the artist's studio. Renee calls on the artist and, appearing to be fascinated with the drawing of Gina's head, commissions him to paint a picture of a nude woman with a head the exact likeness of the drawing.

On the wedding day, while Raoul and Gina are in the midst of their guests, a carefully wrapped painting arrives, a present for the bridegroom from Renee. The guests gaily demand that it be opened, and when this is done the striking portrait of the bride meets their astonished eyes. The sharp tongue of scandal starts to wag, and poor blinded Raoul feeling himself shamed and dishonored, demands an explanation from Gina. But the astonished bride is almost speechless.

Crazed with rage, Raoul rushes to the studio and, after a stormy scene, uncovers Renee's infamous plot to injure Gina. Gina follows, and here a reconciliation is quickly effected. Renee, realizing that Raoul and Gina might seek out the artist, rushes to the studio to buy his silence, but she is too late, for the artist directs her gaze to the reunited couple in a lover's fond embrace.

VICTOR.

ALL FOR LOVE (Sept. 13).—Little Flo is the daughter of a blind musician and the pair live by means of the few pennies tossed to them on the street, the father playing the violin and Flo dancing and singing to his accompaniment. Death overtakes the old man in front of the country residence of an eccentric novelist named Roland. Roland and his sister take Flo into their home and, becoming much attached to her, they virtually adopt her. Three years later Flo has grown into a talented society girl and is received everywhere as a member of the Roland household. Roland himself has learned to love the little waif with all the pent-up passion of a hitherto loveless existence but is afraid of frightening her by a declaration—indeed he is of too timid a nature to do so.

It happens that Norris, a well-known vaudeville manager, goes to spend a brief vacation in the neighborhood of the Roland house. In one of her rambles, Flo one day dances and sings on a cliff near her home and one of her shoes flies off and in falling, strikes Norris on the head, that gentleman happening to be strolling aimlessly at the base of the cliff. He climbs the rocks, the shoe in his pocket, and the two have a very romantic and rather humorous meeting.

This meeting leads to a better acquaintance and Norris is received as a regular visitor at the Roland house. Norris also falls desperately in love with Flo and as he is a younger and better looking man, he apparently has every chance of winning her affections. Roland notices the growing intimacy between the young people and gives Norris every encouragement, although it nearly breaks his heart to do so.

Then Norris proposes that Flo go on the stage. Flo is wild with delight over the prospect and leaves with Roland's sister to begin her career. After a triumphant debut, she goes on the road and is acknowledged as a successful vaudeville star. Going home on a vacation, accompanied by Roland's sister and Norris, they find Roland lonely and dejected, utterly unable to work. He tries to appear cheerful, but at an awful cost to himself. Then Norris asks him for Flo's hand in marriage, Flo watching the interview. Roland gives his entire consent, but in doing so he reveals to Flo for the first time, the depth of his love for her. In a flash it comes to her that she has always loved him and him only and when Norris addresses her, she gently sends him away. Then running to Roland she leads him into confessing his love and stealing into his arms she gives herself to him, resigning her brilliant future in the outside world.

POWERS.

HIS FIRST AND LAST APPEARANCE (Sept. 11).—A theatrical troupe is stranded. The manager discovers that Hiram Spinks, who runs a general store, has ambition to become a Shakespearian actor. With Hiram's money they engage the Opera House, and, while making arrangements in Hiram's store, the balance of the troupe devour everything in sight. Hiram, in his enthusiasm, does not notice the damage being done.

On account of local talent appearing in a well-known Shakespearian production, the Opera House is packed, and, of course, the manager in his capacity, acts as ticket seller. While the performance is going on and Hiram is making a fizzle in his role, the sheriff from the town from which the troupe has just left arrives and wants to levy on everything, including the manager and the money.

The troupe inform the sheriff that the manager is on the stage acting and, while the sheriff goes before the scenes and sees Hiram, the rest of the troupe escape and we see them on their way, riding on a flat car.

THE SUPREME POWER (Spt. 11).—A young mother, whose husband is a drunkard, gives birth to a baby which is suddenly taken ill. The angel of death appears to carry away the spirit of the child. The mother frantically fights, pleads and prays to the picture of Christ showing the scene depicting "Little children come unto Me." The angel of death, realizing the sorrow of the young mother, depicts the life of the child as it goes through manhood and the temptations in his path. After viewing the various scenes, showing the downfall of the child, the mother willingly and gladly tells the spirit to take her child to the Kingdom of God, as the soul is now pure.

The father staggers in as the last scene of the life of the child is shown, and realizing the wreck he has made of his life, resolves to turn over a new leaf and we see the angel departing with the spirit of the child, and the father's resolute face turns toward a new and better life.

THE TURN OF FATE (Sept. 10).—A Mexican bandit with his motherless girl is chased by a sheriff's posse, and the little girl is lost in the race. The bandit is captured, tried and sentenced to be hung, while the little girl is found by a traveler and placed in an orphan asylum. The bandit escapes and swears vengeance on the judge who sentenced him. In the meantime, the little girl is adopted by the judge, who finds a locket on her neck. Fifteen years after, the bandit captures the judge's adopted daughter, not knowing she is his own daughter, and takes her to his hiding place, leaving her in charge of a mute. He goes to send notice to the judge that he can have his daughter by paying a large ransom. During his absence, the girl gets the better of the mute and almost escapes as the bandit returns. He sends the mute outdoors and tells him to shoot, and shoot to kill, if anybody as much as moves the blanket at the window. He then locks the door. The girl attacks him, and in the scuffle he finds the locket by which he recognizes the girl as his own daughter. He goes to the window to tell his men to let her go, and as he moves the blanket the mute shoots, and he is mortally wounded, but has strength enough to call his men and tell them the ransom is paid, and for them to escort her to safety. As they leave the room he falls dead without telling anyone she is his own daughter.

GENTLEMEN—

Enclosed find check in full payment for the Radium Gold Fibre Screen we recently purchased of your company. The screen is giving first class satisfaction, both to our patrons and ourselves, and we have heard many complimentary remarks from our patrons regarding the clearness of our pictures. We ran a Gaumont the other day and we never saw anything like it before. Every tint was brought out, and the picture could have safely been called a "Moving Painting."

We had practically no trouble at all in installing the screen, and all the parts were in first class condition. Consider us boosters for the Radium Gold Fibre Screen.

We might add that we are running on twenty amperes, where formerly we used forty and sixty amperes, and are getting a better picture.

If any brother exhibitor is skeptical regarding the screen, tell him to drop in on us.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) TOWNER & SPRINGETT.

voted squaw, but she cannot lift him. Jack and Bess are out riding. They come across Eagle and Dark Feather, and, seeing his bad plight, lift him on his horse and take him back to their camp and attend to his injuries.

Dark Feather, believing that Eagle is being taken a captive, rides into the Sioux camp, and gives the alarm. The Sioux thereupon ride swiftly to the settler's camp and attack it. Eagle hears the war whoop, and, crawling painfully from his packet, he makes himself known and stops the attack. During the short fight, a half-breed steals through the wagon lines, and attempts to abduct Bess, but Eagle appears and commands him to go. Jack and Bess go to get water, the olla breaks, and Jack returns to camp to get another, leaving Bess to await his return. Boyd and two Indians find her and ride off with her, but they are seen by Dark Feather who gives the alarm.

Eagle overtakes the half-breed, who transfers Bess from his horse to one ridden by one of his Indians. He and Eagle fight on horseback and the half-breed falls. Jack and several Indians intercept the half-breed's companions and rescue Bess and take the abductors prisoners. Eagle and Dark Feather ride to the settlers camp with Jack and Bess, and are amply rewarded with a big dinner.

A SQUATTER'S RIGHTS (Sept. 12).—L. L. Howe, a New York millionaire, and his son Frank, buy a large tract of land in the Adirondacks. On a portion of this land an old settler, Hayes, has squatted. He considers the land his own and resents the newcomers' intrusion. Frank falls in love with the squatter's daughter, and her country lover, Zeke, determines to make away with his rival. Frank is dangerously wounded by Zeke, who leaves him for dead at the foot of a cliff. A search party starts, led by Mr. Howe, but they fail in their search. Rose Hayes, Frank's sweetheart, is more successful, and aided by her little brother, she saves Frank. In recognition of her bravery and love, Mr. Howe consents to allow the Hayes family to retain the land, and the young couple are happily married.

IMP.

THE INTRIGUE (Sept. 9).—Lieut. White, of the U. S. Naval Department, is in love with O. Yuki San, the Japanese Ambassador's niece, who reciprocates his affection. The lieutenant seeks to gain the Ambassador's consent, but is refused. The Japanese noble, however, has him shadowed by his agent, and, upon learning that he has in his charge the plans of a new dreadnaught, hits upon a plan to secure them, by making use of his niece and her affection for the young lieutenant. He gives his consent on condition that Yuki secures the plans and assures her that no harm will come to her lover. Notwithstanding the seriousness of the matter, and consulting only her heart, the girl consents, and immediately notifies the lieutenant of her uncle's surrender.

She persuades her lover to show her through the Naval Department, having pre-arranged a plan with the Japanese Secret Agent. The pair and the spy are in turn shadowed by two of the lieutenant's confreres, whose suspicions were aroused while jokingly reading the note sent to White by his sweetheart.

Having secured access to the building for the spy through a trick, the girl, after seeing the dreadnaught's plans, pretends a faint and, while the lieutenant is gone for a restorative, attempts to pass the plans to the spy. Through the watchfulness of the two friends, however, the plan fails, and in a quick, sharp struggle in the hall, the spy is captured and the girl confronted.

She confesses to her lover, however, that she was ignorant of the magnitude of the undertaking, and that she did it only to gain her uncle's consent to their union. Realizing to what lengths the girl has gone to for him, White very naturally forgives her and all ends happily for the lovers.

CHAMPION.

THE TRYSTING TREE (Sept. 9).—Alice and Jack are sweethearts. The action opens in a park or wooded lot. Jack discovers a hollow in an old elm tree. They conceive the romantic idea of using the hollow as a "post office," and they leave notes there for each other. They are surprised in their love-making by Jimmie, who is promptly bumbled, and he vows to get even for the affront. At a party Jack becomes jealous of Alice and the result is a quarrel. Each repairs to the old tree, expecting the other to write and make peace overtures, but is disappointd. Finally Jack, believing himself at fault, writes a contrite note and places it in the hollow of the tree. Alice, in making her daily call to the tree, notices Jack in that vicinity. She is seen by him and both are happy. Jimmie sees Jack place the note in the hollow and stealthily abstracts it. Alice looks in the hollow and finds no letter, and is disappointed. After she is gone Jimmie is stricken with remorse, and replaces the letter in the hollow of the elm. A few days elapse and Jack, getting no response from the letter, leaves the village for a city.

Alice sees him through the window of her home bidding good-bye to his companion, and believes he has not forgiven her.

The action is carried forward twenty years. Jack has flourished and become a prominent and influential broker, but has remained a bachelor. Alice has remained unmarried and has devoted her life to caring for her aged mother. In his bachelor apartments, surrounded by luxury, Jack is obsessed by an idea to revisit the scenes of his boyhood. He returns to his native village, visits the park, and draws near the old tree. It awakens memories of long ago. He is taking pictures of the old tree. Drawing nearer he notices the scars of the initials he cut and is visibly affected. Absent-mindedly he reaches into the hollow and pulls out the letter he wrote many years ago. It is yellowed with age, but he recognizes it and marvels. Taking the letter to the home of Alice unopened he hands it to her in silence. With trembling fingers she opens it, looks into his eyes, and discovers the old love light.

ECLAIR.

MY WIFE'S AWAY; HURRAH (Sept. 17).—Pompous Mr. Bailey was a type known the whole world over. Plenty would he spend downtown, but not a cent would he leave at home. Mrs. Bailey wants a dress. Mr. Bailey says "no."

Many are the schemes women can concoct when they want a dress. She makes Bailey believe she has gone to her mother after engaging an old colored mammy to care for the home. But the colored mammy is none other than Mrs. Bailey herself. With the aid of a cousin who is an actress she blackens up and pretends to be both deaf and dumb.

Bailey plans great sport now that she's away. He has a poker party. The colored mammy beckons him aside and writes him a note which says, "I'll tell your wife." Bailey slips a bill in her hand. So follow many little blackmails of a comical turn until he comes home with a troop of actors and actresses. Jealousy gets the better of her and, with a broom and duster, she routes them all, and makes known to Bailey her mistaken whereabouts. The tables now are turned, for her bribes have amounted to the cost of an entire wardrobe. Bailey is reformed.

A FRIVOLOUS HEART (Sept. 22).—Isabel is the bread-winner for her invalid mother and herself. They live in a mountain resort where the sole means of livelihood is to serve as guide to tourists. As no one would accept a girl guide she assumed the guise of a young man.

A young honeymoon couple engaged her and to provoke her husband, because of a quarrel, the young wife flirts with the handsome young guide. And her husband grows angry. But later he discovers Isabel in her true sex, and sets about planning to teach his wife a lesson.

The wife continues to flirt, then comes the unveiling of her folly. In a most ingenious way she is made to suffer the pangs of a threatened tragedy till the sex of the young guide is exposed to her knowledge. Then Isabel is engaged as her maid.

THROUGH CHINA (Sept. 22).—A number of highly instructive and immensely interesting views of a peculiar country and still more singular people.

FILIAL LOVE (Sept. 19).—The foreman of the Ironton Steel Company department has been found murdered and near him lay a knife which belonged to one of his under-workmen. So upon this circumstantial evidence, Harvey Davis, the workman, was arrested and indicted for murder.

On the night of the murder, Davis' little son, Harvey, Jr., had come to the saloon where both his father and the foreman were together drinking, and begged his daddy to come home to supper. While there, the youngster had noticed a peculiar visaged man borrow his papa's knife and not return it. The little tot tried to tell this detail to the coroner and the lawyers, but they somehow refused to listen as the stranger could not be found. The youngster's story was taken as just a bit of childish romancing.

The little codger listens as the lawyer tells his mother that there is practically no hope of securing an acquittal. Again Harvey, Jr., intercedes with the story of the strange man with the awful face and the lawyer laughs and his mother tells him to keep quiet. Then he remembered hearing his "daddy" speak of Mr. President Taft and of Justice. He sneaked off to his little room and gathered those things together which he anticipated needing in his trip to Washington, D. C. On the kitchen table he left a note, ill-spelled, it is true, but it told that he was off to see Mr. Taft and get justice.

He managed to get aboard the train and when discovered by the conductor, he told such an ingenious story that he was allowed to continue on to Washington, the place of his highest hopes. He arrives in the Capital and goes to the fountain which stands before the Congressional Library and washes up preparatory to his reception by "Mr. Taft." He makes quite the natural mistake of going first to the Capitol Building, but he is soon set aright and directed to follow on up Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House, where he may see Mr. Taft. So up the avenue he trudges till the White House grounds are reached.

He tells the doorman his desires and is laughingly told to return next day. Being refused an may chance to come forth. All day long he waits audience he decides to wait about till "Mr. Taft" without reward. Night comes and he goes to sleep on a bench.

It is now next morning and a guard has discovered our little hero. A crowd collects around him and among them he sees the man who borrowed his father's knife and who he knows committed the murder for which his father is held and is about to pay the penalty. Jumping on the bench he accuses him and commands the policeman to arrest the man. Something in the child's dominant sincerity compels the officer to believe his accusation, and he takes the accused man in charge and to the station house.

At the jail the man is questioned. Little discrepancies in his answers cause them to credit the youngster's story, and they ply him unrelentingly with a rapid fire of questions till the man breaks down under their inquisition and confesses.

The jury is just returning from the jury room prepared to render a verdict in the case of the State vs. Harvey Davis, charged with murder. The verdict they are about to render is that of guilty in the first degree. A message arrives, the judge hears it, and orders their verdict withheld because of new and admittable evidence. The child has secured justice, not through Mr. Taft, but through his own efforts.

NESTOR.

IN THE SAN FERNANDO VALLEY (Sept. 9).—Frank Parton, a young rancher, and Jim Steele are great friends. Jim is engaged to be married to Frank's sister, Helen. One day Jim watches Frank counting out the money for the wages. Frank puts the money in the desk drawer, and locks it as Jake, the foreman, comes in with some papers to sign. That evening Jim and Helen return somewhat late from a ride and enter the house at a time when Frank is not in. Helen leaves Jim in order to change her dress, and Jim seats himself in the parlor. He hears a noise in the office and goes in, expecting to find Frank. Instead he sees Jake rifling the drawer. He gets the drop on Jake and makes him return the money; the foreman drops to his knees and begs for another chance, promising he will not do wrong again. Jim is very human and resolves to give him the opportunity to reform. At this juncture Frank opens the door and closes it quietly. Jim hears the door and tip-toes to it to seew who is there. As he does so, Jake again takes the money. Frank enters and Jim makes excuses for him and the foreman leaves.

Frank thanks Jim for saving the money and opens the drawer. It is gone. He accuses his friend of being in league with Jake and summons his mother and sister. Jim is outraged and humiliated and offers little in the way of explanation. He leaves. Jim writes to an old friend of his father's, who wires him to come along and to bring his mother and sister with him. Jim goes and leaves no trace behind him.

The foreman is injured and confesses the crime before he dies. Helen begs Frank to find Jim and he promises to do so. Two years later his search is rewarded and he finds that Jim is a partner in a thriving ranch. He asks forgiveness and tries to explain away the mistakes made. Jim is adamant, but as Frank turns to go he thinks of a letter given him by Helen. Frank reads it and it is so charged with pitiful repentance and sorrow that Jim forgives and they go back to get her. Jim and Helen are reunited and it is clear that their marriage will be closely followed by one between Frank and Jim's sister.

THE MAN WITHIN (September 11).—Dick rides up to the hotel badly wounded. The hotel-keeper, Dan, and his daughter, Annie, send for the doctor and nurse him, and it is not until a few weeks later that Dan, who is running for sheriff, reads in a newspaper the following article that he realizes Dick is the outlaw:

"Dick Bisley Escapes. It is reported that Dick Bisley, who was severely wounded after a desperate fight with the sheriff's posse in Jackson County, made his escape and is now hiding in the hills of Bear County."

Dan is elected sheriff and goes to take his oath of office. In the meanwhile, Annie finds the paper, and also realizes that Dick is the outlaw. He confesses to her, but she resolves to give him another chance. She gives him a horse and sends him on his way. Her father returns and finds Dick gone. He calls his posse and starts in pursuit. In the meanwhile Dick has located his followers, but before they can get away, the new sheriff and his men are almost upon them. A chase follows. Dick rides off to one side. Dan sees this and follows, dismounts and fires. He severely wounds Dick, who returns fire and wounds the sheriff; but as soon as he sees the sheriff fall and recognizes him, the outlaw comes to his aid. Dick takes the sheriff back to the hotel, where he revives. At the sheriff's command, he handcuffs himself, but ere they can lead him away with his followers, whom they have captured, he dies.

THOSE LOVESICK COWBOYS (Sept. 13).—The advent of Mabel Jones on her uncle's ranch in Stony Gulch creates great havoc among the boys. Three of them, Bob, Frank and Jack are so smitten with her charms as to forget their own sweethearts who rise up in arms and are glad indeed when Mabel's visit is over.

The boys' hearts go with Mabel and for a while an atmosphere of gloom surrounds them. Secretly each writes a letter to the fair one, addressing it to Miss Mabel Jones, Los Angeles, for lack of better direction. The three letters are delivered to a Miss Mabel Jones, an old maid living at 1432 North Street, Los Angeles, and the old dame goes crazy on receiving three proposals of marriage. She eagerly answers the letters stating that she would marry the first to reach her.

Bob, Frank and Jack receive the letters in due time, read the contents and decide to keep the treasure secret from one another. They make a dash for the corral and, mounting their horses, ride away at a breakneck speed. Bob reaches the village first and, as several miles intervene from there to the railroad station, he looks around for a faster method of locomotion. Pressing an automobile into service he soon leaves his companions behind. Frank not wishing to be left out of the race, engages a motorcycle, and speeds away down the road as though bent upon breaking all records. The best that Jack can do is to change his horse for a fresh one. Bob, overconfident of victory, is taking things easy when something goes wrong with his machine. Frank and Jack both pass him and in despair he abandons the automobile and gives chase on foot. A razor-back mule comes to Bob's rescue. In the meantime, Frank is pondering over his ill-luck when Bob and the mule appear. Against Bob's vehement protest Frank leaps on the mule's back and off they go. At the depot Jack has to wait for the train, which delays long enough to give the other two boys an equal chance.

Arriving in the city they scramble hither and thither in a feverish search for North Street, the home of their loved one. Bob is first to reach Miss Jones' house, and on asking for the lady is much astonished to feel the loving embrace of the old maid. He manages to free himself just as Frank rushes in, and he, too, receives a very affectionate welcome. Jack comes in last, precipitating into the yearning arms of Miss Jones. The three boys work hard to get out of the old maid's clutches, and finally succeeded in leaving the house. Panting they stop in front of a church and are amazed to see the lovely Miss Jones in her bridal array step into an automobile with the happy bridegroom. The wedding guests look on in amusement to see three cowboys attempting to speak to the bride. Old Miss Jones is on the trail, and Bob, Frank and Jack cut short their conversation and make a dash for the wild and wooly.

TOMMY'S PLAYMATE (Sept. 13).—Tommy's rich uncle is very much devoted to him and, therefore, bequeathes his large fortune to Tommy's parents. Mr. Wilde, the uncle, is addicted to the use of dangerous drugs, and this harmful practice finally leads to his becoming insane. As Tommy's parents are not the direct heirs, they spare no pains in concealing this calamity from the world. When later, in an insane moment, the uncle conceives the fiendish idea of locking Tommy in a deserted hut in the woods and throwing his cap into a pond, thus leading his bewildered parents to believe that Tommy is drowned; they are placed in a very awkward situation. However, Tommy's little playmate, Fido, a sharp little dog, discovers Tommy is hidden and takes him food and drink. This smart little dog finally carries the message to Tommy's parents, in which Tommy writes telling of his predicament. Tommy is rescued and, when later his uncle finally does pass away, Tommy's little playmate is not forgotten.

GAUMONT.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S TOKEN (Sept. 17).—The Virgin Queen of England, during whose reign England reached its highest status of culture, was not without traces of the moral weakness of her father, Henry the VIII. Her infatuations were extremely numerous, as the sudden deaths of many of her statesmen and chief advisors substantiate. None, however, approached closer to her real life than did the Earl of Essex, more familiarly known as Sir Walter Raleigh.

This courtier first ingratiated himself to the regard of Queen Elizabeth by placing his robe across a puddle which lay in her path. For his consideration Elizabeth regarded him with a liberal amount of attention at the court ball held shortly thereafter, much to the chagrin of Admiral Howard. This gentleman could not conceal his jealousy and bore from the first a deep-seated fatal grudge against the earl. As a mark of her special favor, the Queen gives to Essex her costliest ring, which was to bear with it an absolute acquittal from all injuries against herself or state.

As time went on the gallant earl was sent to quell the Irish, who were rising in revolt across the border line. However, his attempts were baffled by the soldiers and he was compelled to return to London, humiliated and downcast. The intriguing Howard incites the queen to refuse the defeated earl entrance to the royal apartments, which so preys upon the mind of the disappointed nobleman that he makes himself a party to a conspiracy then on foot against the Virgin Queen. The plot is discovered. Essex is identified as one of its chief instigators, is captured and condemned to death. The queen, mindful of her solemn promise, selects Lady Howard to go as messenger to her former lover, the luckless earl, and bear the news that the queen is ready to pardon him for his treason if he but return her ring. The humiliated Essex at first prefers to die than win the grace of his monarch because of past favors, but is finally persuaded to deliver the trinket to Lady Howard, who proceeds at once to the royal apartments to hand it to the queen. On her way she intercepts her husband. The scheming admiral realizing the cudgel he almost has in his hands, plans to revenge himself by wresting the ring from his wife.

In the meantime the queen is told that her former lover refuses to return the trinket and in her ire she orders the execution of Essex to proceed at once. Slowly he mounts the guillotine to his fated end, where the queen bears witness to his courageous approach to death.

Even though her lover is lost, she cannot forget him and casts the castle in an atmosphere of deepest mourning, which almost interferes with her transaction of state affairs. Finally the truth comes out. It is discovered that Lady Howard has escaped and that the admiral possesses the ring. In her fury the queen rises to give orders to capture this dastardly couple, but the revelation is too big a shock to her. She swoons as the figure of Essex on the execution platform rises as a mist before her, and from this swoon she never revives.

KINGS IN EXILE (Sept. 19).—The Queen of Messina and her son, Prince Charles, are living in Paris in exile with a few loyal subjects who have clung to them since the Revolution responsible for their overthrow. The young prince becomes infatuated with the favorite Parisian actress, Denise Marvel.

One morning Denise learns that the matinee in which she was to take part has been postponed and she writes Prince Charles that she will be very pleased to take a walk through the park with him. The letter reaches its consignee at a most unpsychological moment, for the missive is delivered to him while in session with his mother, the Queen. General Dimitriki and several of the exiled royal cabinet. The French newspapers get hold of the infatuation and come out with an article to the effect that Prince Charles is about to marry Denise Marvel. The Queen then decides that the prince must be separated from the stage beauty. Just at this point Denise declines a theatrical engagement because she is confident that the prince will make her his wife within the next month. However, the loyal subjects of His Royal Highness prevail upon the prince to devote more of his time in the interests of the state and less to the actress. This persuasion finally leads to a letter from Prince Charles to Denise, explaining that they must now cease to see each other forever. The letter, together with the result upon Denise, throws the Prince into the utmost unconsolability. A few weeks later the young prince is shocked at an article he comes across in a newspaper. It is pertaining to the wreck of the Acquitaine, which had gone down off Madeira with almost all its passengers. Among those who had not been accounted for were a troupe of French artists, chief among whom was the Parisian favorite, Denise Marvel. This intelligence has the most disastrous effect upon the Prince Charles, who is seized at once with brain fever. He is ordered to a private sanitarium. While confined in the walls of this resort, the prince is not allowed to read any of the papers, a fact which enables the queen and her staff of advisers to keep from telling him that a pinnace of the ill-fated steamship had been found by fishermen off the American coast with twelve persons alive in it, among whom number Miss Denise Marvel, her maid and several other distinguished persons were found.

It is the plan of the mother and General Dimitriki to keep the prince in complete ignorance of this fact, but love is ever able to overcome deception. Denise is responsible for this, for as soon as she returns to Paris and learns that the prince has been removed most mysteriously to a sanitarium, she engages the services of Detective Arville to locate her lover for her. He starts out at once and soon discovers him to be at Biarritz. After a considerable amount of cunning, he leads the little actress into the confines of this large building. They take their hiding-place in the funeral chamber, for the detective has learned that it is here that Prince Charles comes at least once a day to mourn his beloved one. The sight of his loved one cures the prince. Prince Charles, now that he has his loved one in his grasp once more, determines never again to leave her and pens a manuscript of abdication from the throne in favor of his mother, the queen, and the younger branches of his house. This relieves the situation and the queen herself, now won over by the charms of the dainty Denise, acquiesces and consents to the marriage.

MAJESTIC.

CUPID VS. CIGARETTES (Sept. 15).—Bert Caldwell, a young man about town, is an inveterate smoker of cigarettes. One day on the beach he meets Edith Gardner. Bert falls in love with her, but Edith takes offense at his habit of smoking. In order to see something of her, Bert pretends to fall ill. Not at all deceived by his ruse, Edith allows him to think she has been taken in and carts him off to a private hospital. Soon after arriving Bert sets fire to his bed while stealing a smoke. That afternoon he is informed that his illness is of so serious a nature that it necessitates an immediate operation. Bert, in a panic, tries to escape, but is caught and brought back. He then confesses his imposture, promises never to smoke again and is allowed to depart. At the door of the hospital he encounters a friend and is again induced to smoke. Edith catches him breaking his promise and when he calls again he is refused admittance. He hangs around her door and when she comes out, he again pleads his love. She takes him into her office and writes her answer on a card. He receives this in transports of joy, under the impression that it is her answer to his suit. In the park he opens the envelope and finds a bill for professional services. The last scene shows him making tracks for a tobacconist.

THORNS OF SUCCESS (Sept. 17).—Robert Vale, a young chemist, is working on a high explosive in his laboratory, when his wife brings him a letter from his uncle, who offers to finance Robert if the tests of the explosive are satisfactory.

Later Robert makes the tests and his uncle gives him a large check. Robert and his wife and child are installed in nice apartments in Washington, where he is trying to sell the invention to the government. He is about to succeed when he meets an adventuress in the pay of the Japanese government. This fascinating woman tries to lure Robert and make him sell his explosive to the Japanese.

On account of this woman he becomes estranged from his family, but an army officer intervenes and gets his wife to appeal to Robert's better nature. So as the sale to Japan is about to be consummated, the wife interferes and succeeds in getting her husband to give the result of his work to his own government, to the discomfiture of the Japanese and the adventuress.

THANHOUSER.

ORATOR, KNIGHT AND COW CHARMER (Sept. 15).—It was the most important of political campaigns (to Congressman Casey) because he was running for re-election. It was also interesting to his enemies, owing to the fact that they hoped to defeat him. One of these enemies was the editor of the opposition paper, and when he heard that the distinguished statesman was to deliver a noonday address in a nearby town, he decided to "stir him up." To accomplish this, he enlisted the aid of his star cartoonist, in appearance a modest, neat little girl, but one who was gifted with fiendish ability with the pencil.

The cartoonist went to the village and on her way to the meeting place made two acquaintances, one a cow, the other, Congressman Casey. The cow galloped across lots to meet her, and she was thoroughly convinced that "he" meant to bite her. Then the gallant congressman appeared, rescued her from the ferocious beast and escorted her to the scene of his oratorical triumph.

Then the girl, having a sense of humor, drew a funny picture of herself, the cow and the congressman, and had it printed in her paper. The girl thoroughly enjoyed it; the cow didn't even say "moo," but the congressman was as mad as a contesting delegation at the national convention. He had no idea of the identity of the artist, but determined to be revenged. He took a large horsewhip and went to the newspaper office, intending to get satisfaction.

It took him some time to get into the art room, as he was obliged to thrash several inoffensive reporters en route. Then he found the artist, a trembling, frightened little girl. It was ridiculous to expect that he could horsewhip her. He didn't have the heart even to scold her. For the first time in his life, the dignified statesman had a sense of humor, and shaking his finger at the girl he said, "Young woman, the next time I find a cow chasing you I'll let you stay up the tree for the rest of your life."

THE MAIL CLERK'S TEMPTATION (Sept. 17).—When a certain U. S. mail clerk was asked why he made his home in a shabby little hotel in a railroad junction, when he could live so much more comfortable elsewhere, he would flush and tell the inquisitive ones to mind their own business. The fact was that he was violently in love with the daughter of the hotel proprietor, and hoped some day to make her his bride.

The clerk was highly indignant one day when he found that a well-to-do traveling man was paying his sweetheart attention. He remonstrated with the girl, but she was flattered because of her new catch and laughed at him. There was a quarrel, and the girl agreed to marry the drummer, and accepted a diamond ring he offered her. To cause the mail clerk as much sorrow as possible, the girl wrote him a note, telling of her engagement, and asking him not to annoy her in the future.

In this letter the girl spoke of her new fiance as a "rich man" and the clerk read the note while out on his run one day, and brooded over this particular line. Bitterly he decided that honesty did not pay, and determined to take the registered letters in his care, and use the money to show the girl that there was more than one rich man in the world.

He looked over the letters and packages, picked out several that seemed especially valuable, when suddenly he came across one package addressed to the other man in a familiar handwriting. The bundle was from the girl, and it added to the clerk's rage. Recklessly he opened it, and found it contained the engagement ring. The girl was sending it back to the drummer, because, as she simply explained the mail clerk "is a good honest boy, and I have loved him all my life."

The clerk realized for the first time how low he was about to fall. He tied up the package again, replaced the others he had selected in the bag, and determined that he would not destroy her faith in him.

He determined to make full confession to the girl when they next met, but was ashamed. He feared that her faith would change to loathing, and determined to die. The girl found him in time to save his life and revived him. He had written a farewell note to her and he motioned her to read it. She saw it was addressed to her, tore it up and held out her arms to him.

And thus the romance of the shabby little hotel came to a happy conclusion.

TWO SOULS (Sept. 20).—The bookmaker was a good-hearted chap, but cursed with a violent temper. He had a quarrel one day with a patron who imagined he had won on a certain race. The bookmaker was in the right, but lost his temper. He struck but one blow, and a moment later found with a thrill of horror that he was a murderer. Then he fled, escaped his pursuers, and sought refuge in an obscure boarding house, where he was not known.

The girl was an unfortunate. She was hard working, but feeble, and found it difficult to obtain employment. At last all her money was gone, and the future held out no promise, so she decided to end it all in the dark waters of the river.

The bookmaker happened to be taking a stroll at the time—he never went out in the daytime, being afraid of being captured. He saw the girl make her leap, plunged in after her, and saved her life. She told him her sad story and he pitied her. Leading her to his boarding house, he placed her in the care of the kindly landlady, and made himself responsible for her. The two friendless ones soon fell in love, were married, took a tiny cottage in a suburban town, and for a time were very happy. Then one day a stranger called and the husband told his wife that he had been called out of town on business, but would return as speedily as possible.

The wife wondered, but made no comment. She did not notice the handcuffs that united her husband and the stranger. At intervals letters came from the husband. She had no worry over financial matters, but she longed to see the man she loved. Finally she could bear the strain no longer, and wrote to her husband in care of his old landlady. She told him how much she missed him, and confided that her health was much worse and her doctor gave her but a short time to live.

The letter was delivered to the husband at a penitentiary, where he was a convict serving a long sentence. It maddened him to make his escape. It was successful, but when he reached his cottage, his wife was dying. He managed to elude her until he had a chance to change his convict stripes. Then he went to her and told her he was back from his business trip, and would never leave her again.

The man was kneeling by his wife's side, when the door was pushed open softly, and two prison guards entered. They were prepared for fight, but there was no fight in the convict. He turned to the men, raised his hand warningly, pointed to his wife, and whispered: "Dying. Wait."

The rough guards stood back respectfully. The woman gasped and expired. Her husband kissed her hands, folded them reverently over her breast, then turned to the waiting guards, and held out his arms for handcuffs. He did not care what became of him on this earth, for the soul of the only person he loved had gone to plead for him before the Great White Throne.

SICILIAN LOVE (Three Reels).—Madam Rosa lives in her own house with her two sons, Maso and Carmelo. The former is a serious, honest and hardworking man, while Carmelo, the younger brother, is pleasure loving and fond of women. He specially loves the beautiful Nunzia, the servant of the house. But Nunzia loves Janu, the coachman.

One day, angry at her persistent refusal, Carmelo forces his attentions upon her. Maso learns the fact, and orders Carmelo to leave the house; then in order to save the girl's honor, combines a marriage between Janu and Nunzia. Later, a little girl is born, and happiness reigns in Janu's house. A year after, Carmelo returns to the house and hears of Nunzia's marriage to Janu. The old passion, mixed now with jealousy, awakens. He goes to her house, but is surprised by Janu, who threatens his life if he enters.

Carmelo goes away, but vengeance is in his mind, and in order to eliminate his only obstacle to regain Nunzia's heart, he goes to a criminal and offers him $1,000 reward for Janu's life. One hour later, Janu is killed by the notorious bandit, Luca de Marco. After a few days Carmelo goes to visit Nunzia and offers her his money and support if she would only consent to love him. But Nunzia still rejects the offer. In the meantime the police are in search of the instigator of the crime.

Luca de Marco comes to the house to get his promised reward. He meets Maso while the police enter the house for an investigation. Afraid of being discovered, Luca de Marco confesses the true facts to Maso. Maso learns the horrible truth and in order to save Carmelo makes Luca escape after giving him the $1,000 promised him by his brother. Maso and his mother offer their hospitality to Nunzia. She accepts. But Carmelo, who had promised to leave the city, seeing that Nunzia was going to live in his mother's house again, tries to induce her to go with him.

He is surprised by Maso, who, tried by his brother's audacity, accuses him in front of his mother and Nunzia of having caused the death of Janu. It was then that Nunzia learns who was the murderer of her husband and wants to denounce him, but the tears of Carmelo's mother make Nunzia promise not to say a word. This drama has just been released.

THE PAST THAT RETURNS (Three Reels).—Rinaldo Raynaldi, a business man, is unable to pay a note of $150,000. He tries to win the shortage at a game. He takes with him all the money that his safe contains and goes to a gambling house, where he loses his last penny. In order to save himself from ruin and dishonor he feigns a theft, and to make the scheme more realistic, hides some valuable titles in the house of his manager, Valeri.

The theft is discovered. After an investigation by the police, the hidden titles are found in Valeri's house. Valeri cannot understand the plot, and in front of that terrible accusation loses his mind. Twelve years have elapsed. The poor Valeri is still in the insane asylum. His wife, reduced to poverty, is sick in the country, and Lydia, their only daughter, is in the city working. One day Lydia receives a letter in which her mother, before dying, reveals to her daughter that Raynaldi has been the cause of their misfortune.

Lydia goes to Raynaldi for a job and is accepted as a typewriter. Raynaldi and his son Emilo fall in love with the girl, who, in order to get revenge, does not reject Raynaldi's courting. One day Raynaldi, in exchange of Lydia's love, offers her a rich apartment in an elegant villa. Emilo goes often to see her. He knows that he is his father's rival, but he has seen that Lydia is not indifferent to his love, and indeed, Lydia loves him.

One day Lydia thinks of putting Raynaldi in front of her insane father, Valeri. She asks permission from the director of the asylum to have her father in her house for a few hours. She then invites Raynaldi to see her. When Raynaldi arrives, the insane Valeri appears before him. He believes this to be a horrible dream, and Lydia, who is present at the scene, accuses him of the theft, at the same time revealing herself to him as the daughter of his victim. The shock kills Raynaldi. Lydia has avenged her father. The insane was taken back to the asylum, and Lydia decides to leave the city forever. She goes to bid Emilo her last good-bye, and ask forgiveness for the pain she caused him. But Emilo's love for Lydia is too strong. He asks her to be his wife, and is accepted.

THE OUTCAST CHILD (Sept. 3).—The Great Reaper had warned them all. The one who was claimed beckoned his wife to his bedside and whispered, "Send for our little Lucette." And so Lucette was brought in, and there at his bedside, she heard her mother promise her father to always and ever love her, their only child, Lucette. Then the omnipotent scythe moved and the father's spirit journeyed into that infinite beyond.

Several years have passed. No promise bound the wife against re-marriage. She could be true to her promise to love Lucette most of all, and yet accept the offer of marriage of the man who now asks her. Lucette hears him ask her mother to be his wife. Her mother answers "yes." The child cautiously steals out of the room, her instinctiveness, her intuition, tell her that she has lost her mother's love and warns her that this man is going to disrupt her promised affection.

And he does. The mother dare not show Lucette even passing attention, but he chides or quarrels. He grows domineering, he becomes petty in his meanness toward Lucette and her mother. His antipathy toward Lucette reaches its height when he takes her to a boarding-school for children, and there tells the principal that Lucette is an incorrigible child. He orders the strictest surveillance placed over her and leaves. Believing him, the principal is over zealous in her efforts to discover bad in Lucette's behavior. The least mistakes are made huge and the treatment of the child is made unbearable, not only by the principal, but by the other children as well, who have all been warned against Lucette.

It is now bed-time in the dormitory. Lucette is scolded by the principal. All attendants leave the room after turning out the lights. Moonlight streams in the room. The other children with one impulse, leave their beds and assail Lucette. Someone coming down the corridor causes them to scamper back to their cots, and soon after they are all asleep. But not Lucette. To her has come the supreme moment of her girlish life. Her youthful determination fires and resolves to be away from further torment. She remembers a kind old uncle who must live somewhere near the school. She gathers her clothes, dresses and steals out and away from what was little more than a prison.

All that night and into the morning she walks and hunts for her uncles' home. Exhaustion overcomes her and she drops unconscious in the road. Here she is found by a van of traveling gypsies who succor and aid her that she may proceed on her way. Lucette leaves them and along the road she decides she can save time and foot-steps by short-cutting across a field. So she climbs the fence and proceeds. She has gone but a short distance through the field when from behind a clump of bushes emerges a herd of cattle. The bull sees her and comes charging forward. Lucette turns and runs. She stumbles and the infuriated beast is upon her. He bellows over his prey, lowers his head to gore and lift her from the ground, when two powerful arms grab his horns. The herders have come up. The bull is thrown and a kind herder takes Lucette to the farm house, where she is again assisted and started on her journey to her uncle's.

All day long she trudges, nightfall comes, and with it starts a snow storm. Fatigued and disheartened, Lucette collapses again. Some strolling players pass along and take her into their caravan. They reach their destination, pitch their camp and give a performance. The chief performer is a wonderful dancer. That night while all are asleep the principal and monster snake escapes from his box, into where Lucette lies sleeping. He crawls upon her. An ember in the camp fire pops, a performer awakes, looks around and sees the peril of little Lucette. Cautiously the others are awakened. The dancer reaches Lucette, a pounce and a gripping grasp, and she holds the treacherous serpent, tail in one hand, head in the other.

Lucette had been awake all through, but fear-stricken. This fright, coming on top of her sufferings and hardships, undoes her wonderful courage, fever and sickness set in and, unable to properly attend her, one of the players goes to a rich man's home in the neighborhood, a man celebrated for his kindness, and asks him to take care of the dear little child. And he gladly agrees.

At the rich man's house, Lucette receives every proper care and attention. She survives what threatened a fatal illness. She is questioned and it transpires that her benefactor knew her mother intimately well in her maiden days.

Her mother is sent a message telling all. It reaches her as she too is on the verge of nervous collapse which followed the news of Lucette's flight from school. The husband and step-father at last moved to a sense of his horrible vindictiveness against one so helpless to combat it, repents as he sees his wife suffering through her mother's love for her child. Together they go to the rich man's, and all three join hands in the promise to live the future in love and harmony.

World's Largest Music House WURLITZER Established 1856; 56th Year

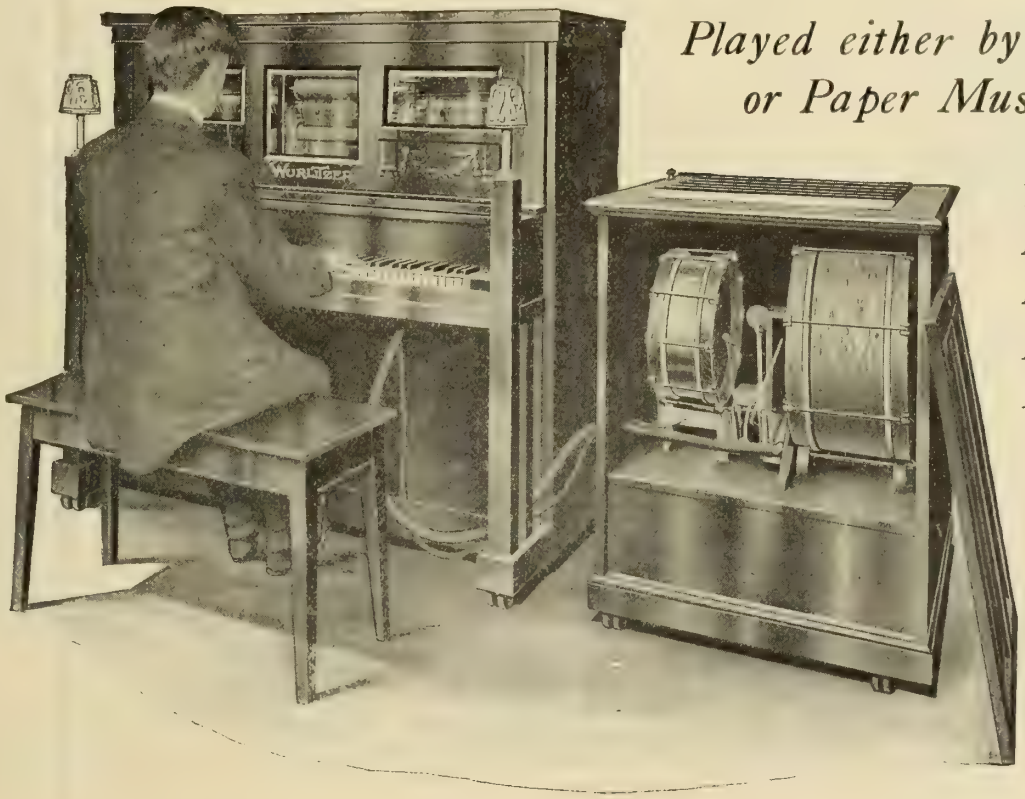
Played either by Hand or Paper Music Roll

Better Music at Less Cost!



Your Music Improved! Expense Reduced!

A New Wurlitzer Musical Instrument for Moving Picture Theatres

HERE is the sensational new Musical Instrument that Wurlitzer has perfected for Picture Theatre work. It combines a piano with violin pipes, flute pipes, mandolin and drum traps. The different music sections can be played separately or in any combination and give the full effect of an orchestra.

This instrument can be played two ways—with paper music roll or with the fingers the same as an ordinary piano. The regular musician can play at night and music rolls can be used afternoons when it might not pay to have a musician.

See this wonderful new Wurlitzer Instrument (Style G) at the nearest Wurlitzer Branch. Compare its music and your saving in your music bill. If you can't call, write for price and liberal time payment offer.

HIGH CLASS ATTRACTION FOR THEATRES CHURCHES AND SCHOOLS

It is that wonderful, exquisite sweetness "Kubelic" draws out of his fiddle that makes his meal ticket spell $1000.00 per hour. A horse fiddle makes more noise but

"What a Difference!"

It is that quaint "humanly human" way "Whitcomb Riley" puts jingles together that makes him loved and famous. Not such great English but his "beat on the heart-strings"

"Makes a Difference."

It was the realism, fine arrangement of color and striking study of light and shadow that immortalized "Rembrandt." A circus ONE SHEET is sometimes even more striking but

"Oh! How Different!"

It is a Motion Picture when you only show "Flickering Shadows" that are meaningless, dull, indistinct, without perspective, roundness or depth and almost without interest. But on a "Mirror Screen" this same picture "comes to life," shows clear, true and sharp. Every detail is visible and not a shade, gleam or shadow is lost and "Believe Me"

"There IS a Difference."

It is a Motion Picture Theatre when your equipment and light is poor and you have a bum curtain. But the "Mirror Screen" insures you a great light so that an ordinary film shows like a FEATURE in comparison. Every foot is so realistic and natural that folks are spell-bound because pictures on a "Mirror Screen"

"Are Different."

It is the Extra Nickels over expenses that means Profits, Bread and Meat and some of Life's Luxuries. It is the "Mirror Screen" that will create a sensation in your theatre, bring the crowds, and it is the only way to get that Wonderful Light WITHOUT EYE-STRAIN. The old and young come and the pictures on the MIRROR are so delightful to look at that they won't miss a reel and that "Keep Them Coming" is what makes, in your bank balance,

"Such a Great Difference."

Please write us today and tell us WHY you don't order that MIRROR.

RECONCILED

THE PRISONER'S STORY

Grace discovers her lover Ross embracing a strange woman. A man is lying dead on the floor. Jealous, she gives the alarm and Ross is apprehended and about to be lynched when Grace is remorseful and pleads with the cowboys to listen to a possible explanation. He then unfolds the sad story of how his sister sold herself in marriage to a gambler to save him, how, after many years, he found them at the deserted ranch, his sister dead, and how he shot the gambler in self defence. The cowboys are touched by the story and the lovers reunited.

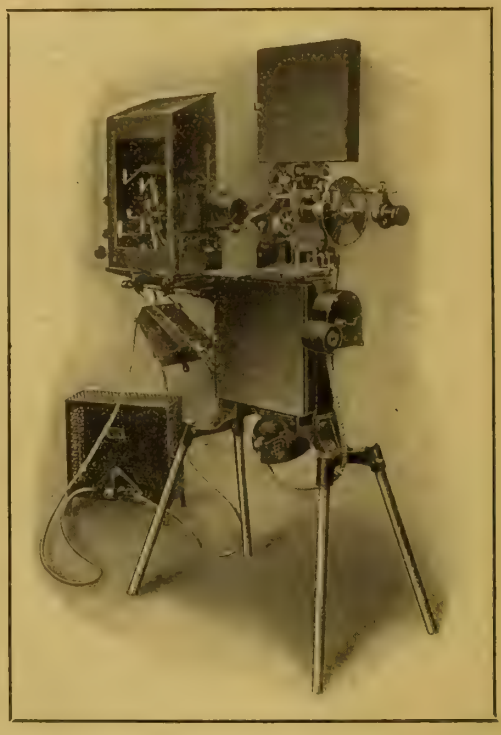
NO. 6A



The Perfect Motion Picture Machine

¶ The most vital point in moving picture machine manufacture, is ACCURACY. The various parts in a machine must be accurately adjusted to the finest point of scientific possibility, or poor projection results.

¶ Speaking of accuracy, we have a letter from a large manufacturer of imitation parts soliciting the repair part business of a large dealer, and boasting that their machines "Are capable of working within one-half a thousandth of an inch."

¶ We make and guarantee all our parts, and practically all of them are made to within ONE-TENTH OF A THOUSANDTH OF AN INCH, or five times more accurate than claimed by the imitator. Greater variation would make them unsatisfactory.

¶ POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A is made in the largest factory of its kind in the world, and is characterized by extreme accuracy of workmanship, and careful selection of the best materials.

¶ ACCURACY is only one of POWER'S many good points. It explains, in a measure, why our output exceeds that of all other moving picture machine manufacturing concerns combined.

¶ We purpose further descriptions of the various superior qualities of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A. Catalogue G will give you full details.

Undine

A marvel-adaptation of the famous Riverside Classic and a "perfect publicity" picture, is not the only feature of

The Thanhouser Three-a-Week

for the week beginning Sunday, September 22. The Sunday and Friday releases for that week (Undine is the Tuesday) are one-reel features and should be billed that way. There is that something in the plot of each that throws them all instantly into the feature class. Check 'em as you get 'em in the squares alongside the titles below:

At the Foot of the Ladder ☐

Sunday, Sept. 22

This is the most sizzling love story that ever left our studio griddle. It is all action. You follow Betty and her lovers with all the interest at your command. You hope with her that she'll fall finally into the right man's arms. You find yourself all stirred up over her love-fate. It is sure one GRIPPING yarn right through.

UNDINE ☐

Tuesday, Sept. 24

A marvel-adaptation of the famous Riverside Classic. With "perfect publicity." Two one-sheets and a three-sheet from your exchange. Illustrated heralds from Hennegan & Company, Cincinnati, Ohio. Cuts for newspaper and circular advertising (2-column) 50 cents apiece from Standard Engraving Company, 560 Seventh Ave., New York City. Slides 30 cents apiece from Novelty Slide Company, 20 East 14th Street, New York City.

"But the Greatest of These is Charity" ☐

Friday, Sept. 27

A rich banker and his daughter look at life from widely different angles. He sees the world at its darkest, she at its sunniest. He believes in holding the down-trodden down, she in raising them up. She dies, and it changes his entire view-point. He comes to see things as his dead daughter saw them—and in the end he gets his child back to share his view-point with him.

IMP

"THE MILLIONAIRE COP."
Monday, September 16th.

Just the kind of King Baggot picture that your patrons have been longing for. A rollicking comedy-drama with sparkling, brilliant, humorous situations and a thrill here and there to make it a real hummer. Nicely acted; most capably produced.

"SWEET ALICE, BEN BOLT."
Thursday, September 19th.

There is something romantically poetical about this picture that it will fill the heart of everyone who sees it with inspiration. It will please the children; it will delight the grown-ups. Numerous children appear in the picture. A very prettily costumed play with an adorable theme.

"THE BLIND MUSICIAN."
Saturday, September 21st (Split).

It really should have been a thousand-footer. But we are willing to sacrifice to give you the best split reels on the market. The dramatic intensity of this story will hold them tight from start to finish.

"THE EXCHANGE OF LABELS."
Saturday, September 21st (Split).

A refreshing little comedy that will cause many a ripple of laughter to resound throughout your house when you project it.

GEM

"DOWN BY THE SOUNDING SEA."
Tuesday, September 17th.

A deep silence will prevail while you are showing it. Your enthralled audience will not utter a sound until the gripping climax has been passed. An exceptionally fine dramatic offering.

CHAMPION

"THE DUMMY DIRECTOR."
Monday, September 16th.

An absorbingly pathetic and spirited drama in which an unscrupulous employer tries to force his attention on his female stenographer, but is outwitted by the girl and her father. Just the kind to start off the new season with.

"101" BISON

"THE RANCHMAN'S AWAKENING."
Tuesday, September 17th.

A great big out-of-the-ordinary story with flashes of heart interest intermingled with dashes of spirited acting. A story of a big-hearted woman and a big-hearted man who traveled o'er life's highways and byways as pals. It's a real high quality picture. Photographically perfect, most effectively staged and directed.

Two Reels. Two Reels.

"THE MASSACRE OF THE SANTE FE TRAIL."
Saturday, September 21st.

Get that S. R. O. sign ready. Have plenty of change on hand. You are going to do the biggest day's business you ever did for a good long while. IT'S HERE. That great big stupendous "101"-Bison that we've been shouting to you about. Let's quote from the M. P. World. That'll help convince you: "Thrilling moments, scenes of real dramatic power." "Impressiveness, power and charm in the final scene." "A craftsmanlike piece of work." "Great camp of Indians—real ones." "The caravan of prairie schooners with crews of out-riders and armed footguards." "The vivid massacre." "Carefully selected cast." Its splendor will remain undimmed for many a day. Simply marvelous.

VICTOR

"FLO'S DISCIPLINE."
Friday, September 20th.

Ah me! Heigh-ho! Too bad it couldn't go on indefinitely. That's just what your patrons are going to say when they see this particularly invigorating Florence Lawrence offering. The biggest ad. for your house is pleased customers, and if this don't make a great big hit for you nothing will. Full of good-natured folly until the last inch is clicked off.

POWERS

"FATE'S WAY."
Friday, September 20th.

The simplicity of the plot, the strength of the story and the most superior manner of presentation of this formidable drama will create so vivid an impression that you'll have to call an intermission to let them get back to earth. Splendidly produced, photographically beautiful and most competently enacted.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A WIDOW."
Wednesday, September 18th.

The comical antics of a lot of college cut-ups. The girls got sore and the boys got mad and the devil was to pay when they started to settle the grudge. Brim full of ludicrous situations.

Have Conquered The World!

the week of Sept. 16

ECLAIR

"MY WIFE'S AWAY—HURRAH !"

Tuesday, September 17th.

He thought she had gone to visit her mother, and when she installed the new houseeeper he didn't suspect that it was his wife in disguise. She stood for a lot of his wild caprices and poker parties, but when the show girls appeared on the scene of action she started something and she also finished it. The pompous Mr. Bailey became as meek as a lamb and nothing was too good for Mrs. Ingeniously comical.

"FILIAL LOVE."

Thursday, September 19th.

There's nothing that gets a big rousing reception like an emotional drama in which a child plays an important part. The story depicted is of absorbing interest and produced with a vividness that will never be forgotten. Scene after scene in which love of parent urges on a mere child to secure the freedom of his innocent father. This is not a mere romance; it's a great big story, well staged and produced.

"A FRIVOLOUS HEART."

Sunday, September 22nd (Split).

There's a sort of originality of plot about this little comedy-drama that will appeal most strikingly to the average motion picture patrons. It's one of those lovable themes that makes "fans" out of the ordinary and "ordinaries" out of the "never-were."

"THROUGH CHINA."

Sunday, September 22nd (Split).

A peculiar country and still more singular people most strikingly presented.

MILANO

"THE TWO OVERCOATS."

"BONIFACIO IN SOCIETY."

Saturday, September 21st (Split).

Here's something really hilarious. A scream getter of the first water. And mind you, it's a comedy split. That's the best part of it, and on a Saturday, too. Talk about your real treats. This is certainly it.

REX

"FARAWAY FIELDS."

Thursday, September 19th.

A picturesque costume drama with a theme so different; so pretty that you will simply rave about it when you see it. Remarkably romantic story. Staged amid the splendors of the royal palace and the beauties of nature. A really pathetic finale, robbed of it's sombreness, yet rich with emotionalism that will dim the eye with tears. Exceptionally well directed.

"THE CONFLICT'S END."

Sunday, September 22nd.

There's something about a picture with a newspaper editorial atmosphere about it that grips you right away. Here's a particularly worth while release. One that you can coin money with. Not one of the "just as good kind," but "better than all." It's a sure fire hit. Go after it now.

NESTOR

"THE HORSE THIEF'S DAUGHTER."

Monday, September 16th.

A right slap bang up-to-date Western drama with a riot of excitement from the opening of the story to the very end. Its powerfully sensational scenes assure its success and popularity. Most thrillingly produced; brilliantly enacted.

"A WESTERN VACATION."

Wednesday, September 18th.

A merry whirl of laughter is this breezy Western comedy. An entirely different idea than ever used in a farce before. You'll get a stitch in your side from laughing before it's over.

"WON BY A CALL."

Friday, September 20th.

You've been looking for diverting comedies. The kind that will keep your patrons good natured. A release that will give them something to talk about to the folks at home. Well, this is it. It's so humorous that it will laugh itself right off the screen.

"CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT"

Three Reels Reproducing the Most Sensational and Heroic Incident in the Nation's History. 1000 Indians and 1000 Soldiers in a Death Struggle in which No Quarter Was Shown.

RELEASED FRIDAY, OCTOBER 4

GENUINE "101" BISON

PRODUCED BY THE NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE CO.

"On the Firing Line"

1 Reel Friday, September 27 1 Reel

This sensational war picture is made doubly notable by the remarkable acting of a child. A Southern lieutenant is granted a short furlough and visits his sweetheart. The house is seized by Northern soldiers, and the officer in command receives orders to attack an unprotected wagon train. The child overhears the plans and tells the hidden man. He escapes from the house and in a break-neck ride gathers the Confederate soldiers together and forms an ambush. The Union soldiers fall into the trap and a wonderful battle scene is shown in which the wagon train is saved and the Northern army driven back. Amazing views, in exquisite photography, are shown of the thrilling conflict. The staging is a faithful reproduction of the time, including costumes, houses, etc.

The Hidden Trail

1 Reel Tuesday, Sept. 24 1 Reel

A strong Western subject, well acted and staged. A doctor is called to the bandits' hiding place, and blindfolded is brought via a hidden trail. He finds a girl held for ransom who is feigning serious illness. How he manages to effect her liberation after many difficulties and after terrific combats between the desperadoes and the deputy sheriffs forms an interesting photoplay.

"THE FORECLOSURE"

Mexican Joe held a mortgage on old John Watkin's place. He used that mortgage to press his suit for Jessie's hand. His persistence caused the old man's death by heart-failure and roused the boys to fury; particularly Jim Wilcox, who loved Jessie. Refusing a hat collection, Jessie went her way alone. Then Jim took the matter into his own hands. How he brought prosperity and happiness out of woe and poverty you should see for yourself.

(Release Thursday, Sept. 19, 1912)

"WHITE TREACHERY"

An old story given a new and novel touch. The cowboy, crafty and unscrupulous, desired the beautiful Indian girl. How he wooed and won her only to meet his own doom, makes a thrilling and beautiful subject. The photography is excellent, the acting superfine and backgrounds of the fairest in all California.

(Release Monday, Sept. 23, 1912)

"BAD PETE'S GRATITUDE"

Bad Pete eyed the collection box with greedy eyes. The little minister gathered his funds with which to build a new church and started for the bank. His pretty daughter, Claribel, much loved by John Walling, accompanied him. Charley Hicox hated John and loved Claribel; so when Bad Pete held up the minister, Hicox saw an opportunity to throw the blame on John. This he did and would have succeeded if Bad Pete's baby hadn't taken sick. Claribel nursed the child back to life and Bad Pete, to square himself, confessed the hold-up. A particularly fine Western, powerfully portrayed and possessing a crooked, twisting plot of many delightful turns.

OTHER ATTRACTIONS

THE LOVE OF THE FLAG

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25th, 1912

A draughtsman is about to betray the plans of Uncle Sam's fortifications to a foreign government. He is moved by a desire for vengeance on officials who have wronged him. He experiences a revulsion of feeling when he sees his little boy patriotically waving a flag in ecstasies of delight as automatic soldiers march by. A wonderfully human story full of patriotism and "love of country sentiments" (Comedy-Drama).

THE FUGITIVE

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27th, 1912

A woman is killed. Her daughter consecrates the soil where her mother fell. Later this sentimental girl, the daughter of a sheriff, hides a fugitive in a shack, out of the reach of her father who is looking for the man. In taking food to the man the girl unwittingly betrays his presence. Shots are fired in a chase and the girl who has become attached to the fugitive imagines he had been killed and by queer coincidence had dropped on her mother's consecrated grave. She grows insane. Her sanity is restored by a remarkable test (Drama).

Released Wednesday, Sept. 18th, 1912. Length about 1,000 ft.

Papa Devoe is rather irascible and, because Billy Ware has unwittingly trod on his favorite corn, opposes his courting daughter Kitty. Billy's sister suggests a scheme—Billy shall jilt Kitty and she shall pretend to be heartbroken. Papa goes after Billy and with a gun demands that he shall make good, which he does. The couple get married, pretending to be indifferent until it is all over; then they rush into each other's arms and give Papa the laugh.

Released Thurs., Sept. 19th, 1912. Length about 1000 ft.

A CHILD'S DEVOTION

Little "Laddie" Hackett does not like the new mamma that his father has taken to brighten his life.

The stepmother does all in her power to win the boy's love, but fails until a new little sister is born. The baby dies and the mother is inconsolable. Laddie goes out to find another baby and steals one that he finds in a baby carriage. Of course, the baby is tracked and when Laddie's new mamma has to give it up the boy rushes into her arms and pleads that he may be her baby.

Released Friday, Sept. 20th, 1912. Length about 400 ft.

TURPENTINE INDUSTRY

An interesting educational picture showing the tapping, rectifying and final uses of Turpentine. The labor is principally operated by Convicts in the Southern States, notably Georgia, Florida and Virginia.

Released Friday, Sept. 20th, 1912. Length about 600 ft.

NO TRESPASSING

Geo. Engle, a Surveyor, trespasses on the Long farm, and being chased, climbs a tree. Mabel Long pretends to faint and drawing attention to herself, enables Engle to escape. Later Mabel bumps into a tethered cow and is so frightened that she climbs the tree. Engle comes to her rescue, but will not help her until she promises to marry him.

Released Saturday, Sept. 21st, 1912. Length about 400 ft.

His Trade

To improve trade Solomon Decker, a glazier, buys a lot of balls and bats for the boys, who immediately get busy at breaking windows. Business is booming for Solomon, but the boys follow the glazier, begging for more balls. The neighbors get wise to the trick and Solomon is landed in a lime box.

Released Saturday, Sept. 21st, 1912. Length about 600 ft.

His Pair of Pants

This farce is a scream: while Smith is digging the garden up, dressed in overalls, his wife sells his work-a-day pants to an old clothes man. Smith's month's salary is in the pocket. The peddler sells the trousers to a Hobo, who spends half of the money and being chased, climbs a barb-wire fence and ruins the garments.

Released Monday, Sept. 23rd, 1912 Length about 1,000 ft.

A Gay Time in Quebec

Fritz and Hans continuing their travels, visit Quebec and immediately start on their quest of sight seeing and having a gay time. They engage a Caleche and ride around. They see a couple of society girls and hastily jump out of the vehicle, forgetting to pay the fare. A policeman, however, draws their attention to the mistake. The girls take a Kodak shot of them and then Fritz and Hans, desiring to get a picture of the Auto Fire Engine, turn in a false alarm. Of course the police again get busy and the Germans are bustled out of the town.

THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

UNDERWRITERS TYPE B

An Unsurpassed Moving Picture Machine From Every Point of View

Special Features of Edison Underwriters' Type "B"

The only machine with hardened steel shafts running in hardened bearings throughout.

Adjustable Outside Revolving Shutter, Chain Take-Up, Extra Large House, with square condenser holder, Double Magazine Rollers, Heavy Brass Terminals on connecting cords, set of Heavy Extension Legs, four of which are 1¼ inches in diameter. A very substantial stand.

"Once used, always used"

If you've just about given up all hope with that cheap moving picture machine—if it's always breaking down and discouraging the crowd with blurred, flickering pictures—get rid of it, now, before it does your business any more harm, and get an Edison Kinetoscope.

The Edison means certainty of success. It projects the sharpest, steadiest pictures, is a simple machine to operate, the most accessible, and is built to stand up to the work. Many have bought Edisons after finding the cheap machines a failure. Write today for catalog 500 and a copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

Facts and Comments

RUMORS of impending changes in the conditions of the film market are heard on many sides. There have been many changes within recent times and though it seems too early to predict the consequences there is a belief in the ranks of the exhibiting branch that these changes have not always been conducive to an improvement in quality. It is impossible to foretell whether any further and greater changes will result in better pictures. The chances are that any radical change in the present conditions will at first result in confusion and very possibly in loss, both to manufacturers and exhibitors. The transition from the present highly organized system of manufacturing and marketing the films to a new basis must necessarily be attended with numerous difficulties.

It might take months for the industry to adjust itself to the new conditions, but we have no doubt whatever that business would eventually settle itself on a very firm and solid foundation. The open market means the survival of the fittest. It would also probably mean a more definite grading of quality in films and in film service than is possible now. An open market three or four years ago would in all likelihood have injured the industry. Wildcat exchanges and irresponsible men in every branch of the business would have been fostered by an absolutely open market. Those who were in practical touch with the industry at that time are agreed that a strong organization of the manufacturing interest resulted in benefits to the entire industry.

Conditions however have undergone a profound change in these years. The personnel of the exhibitors has improved wonderfully and they have found and are finding means and ways of asserting their power. There is a strong nucleus of a national organization with every prospect of a rapid and wholesome growth. The exhibitor to-day may safely be trusted to select the good and clean films. The vast investments in the exhibiting branch show plainly enough that there are plenty of thoroughly responsible men in the exhibitors' ranks. The exhibitor to-day would probably reap all the benefits of an open market and suffer but little through its inconveniences. The number of experienced exhibitors with sound judgment is greater than ever before in the history of the motion picture. If an open market is to come in the near future, exhibitors will be much better qualified to profit by it than they would have been four or five years ago.

THE continued prevalence of foreign films dealing, of course, with foreign subjects is a frequent cause of complaint, both among exhibitors and managers of exchanges. Perhaps some of this prejudice against foreign films is unreasonable; no prejudice against American films exists on the other side of the water. The prejudice, however, exists here, and must be reckoned with. The exhibitor who is in a position to offer the most American pictures dealing with American subjects has, in nine cases out of ten, the advantage over his competitor whose program is topheavy with foreign products. There ought to be in the selection of foreign subjects a greater preponderance of classic subjects, in which the limits of geography, language and nationality are not too striking and noticeable.

WE are voicing the sentiments of both exhibitors and patrons in calling attention to so many poor, unmeaning, confusing and incorrect titles and sub-titles. Recently we saw these four sub-titles in succession: "The Next Day," "The Following Morning," "The Succeeding Afternoon," "Later." We can easily conceive the fearful mental strain from which the maker of these sub-titles must have been suffering. The matter of titles is one whose importance cannot be overestimated. We have seen a very ordinary picture carried along on the screen and made endurable by clear, appropriate and convincing titles, and, on the other hand, we have seen a good picture marred by the careless, slovenly work of the title-maker. There are some manufacturers who display excellent judgment in the choice of titles, but we fear that they are in the minority. Titles should only appear at the proper psychological moments. At such times they are most welcome. Titles should never be used in trying to break the monotony of half a dozen pictures showing the same scene. We believe THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has been largely instrumental in putting a stop to those hideous titles which were translated from a foreign language into English by means of a crowbar and a dictionary. We hope that these timely warnings will tend to abate the nuisance of slipshod titles.

A FRIEND of the motion picture recently asked THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD what progress had been made in the production and development of purely educational films. It was quite easy to reply that we were "making considerable progress." When, however, the question was asked whether there was any series of pictures, either historical or geographical, which could be used in the place of a textbook, no very satisfactory answer could be given. As a matter of fact, there is no such series. If the legislature of any State were to think of introducing the teaching of history in cinematographic pictures there are at this moment no director, no studio and no facilities whatever for producing genuinely historic films. Take for example the history of the State of New York. Under proper supervision, in which a director and historian could join forces, it would certainly be possible to produce a series of pictures which, with suitable short lectures, would far surpass any textbook now in use in any of our schools. Let us take two children of about the same age and equally gifted. Let one be instructed by means of textbooks and let the other learn through looking at cinematographic reproductions; then let both children be examined and asked to reduce their impressions to writing or to tell them in words. The child having seen history re-enacted on the screen will be far more vivid in his description than the one whose mind was cultivated by the dry book method. We hope that the practical application of this very apparent principle will not be too long in coming. A strictly historical department conducted with a view to supplying the schools would, it seems to us, be no bad investment for an American manufacturer of the first rank.

Factory Or Studio?

W. Stephen Bush

WE have a right to be optimistic regarding the future of our great invention. The history of the motion picture from its early beginnings to the present time is a record of unparalleled progress and prosperity. Is this good fortune still on its upward course? On the surface of things there is much to encourage an answer in the affirmative. In its battle with the theater, the motion picture came, saw and conquered. It has made the fanatics and "reformers" with their furious onslaughts against the industry look like so many cheap reincarnations of Don Quixote, rushing his battered lance against the mills driven by the wind. No amusement is to-day half as firmly entrenched as the motion picture.

We must not take it for granted that this state of affairs will continue and that lean years are impossible in the future. Indeed the lean years may be nearer at hand than many of us think. We are constantly in the presence of a most exacting judge, to-wit: the public, on whose support depends the life of the industry. To watch this public, to observe its taste, its intelligence, its likes and its dislikes is not the least important function of moving picture journalism. Long continued and careful observation emboldened the writer of these lines to say that the products of many manufacturers have distinctly declined within the last six or nine months and that this decline is well and unfavorably known to the millions of Americans who make up the audiences in the electric theaters throughout the land. The chief causes and most apparent symptoms of this decline are monotony and dreary repetition. In the plants of some manufacturers the studio seems to be more of a factory. In a factory, "goods, wares and merchandise are produced by mechanical process or the skill of the human hand." In the studio art is the dominant factor. Either the studio is built for the factory or the factory is made for the studio. As soon as the making of pictures is reduced to a more or less mechanical function, art flees from the studio and the result is a film which just about reaches to the level of the "nickel-in-the-slot" standard. There are a few moulds or types from which there is never any real departure. Plays are made up much like the dishes on a cheap menu and instead of scenarios we get a sort of dramatic formula of recipes, as for instance sixty per cent. pathos, twenty per cent. of "pure weeps," twenty per cent. of American flag, "curly headed child," etc. A good many pictures which have been recently turned out by manufacturers of established reputations seem to revive on the screen all the stupidities of the melodrama which we have helped to laugh out of existence. Worse than all there is an almost total absence of genuine humor in a very large percentage of recent productions. It is painful even to remember some of the stuff that has recently been inflicted upon the public and which manufacturers have unblushingly labelled "comedies."

The motion picture in order to live and prosper must constantly rise and strive with never lagging zeal for originality. We know that throughout the country scores of theaters have adopted motion pictures as their steady programme in place of regular theatrical attractions. We know that within the last year there was a great dearth of paying attractions and that hundreds of thousands of dollars were lost in big amusement enterprises. The real cause of all this disaster must eventually be sought in the inability of the managers and producers to gauge public taste. The public will not take whatever is offered to it and no theatrical trust will ever succeed in forcing the public to feed upon what it chooses to give. It would be well for us to profit by the losses recently recorded in the theatrical world. The public will not pay unless we are able to please it. The moment the pictures begin to get tiresome the public will desert the picture theaters. The time to avert the evil is right now while the remedy is easy of application. An inferior or mediocre production has a tendency to drag others in the same industry down to its own level.

Exhibitors all over the country are keenly aware of this situation. It happens altogether too often that patrons leave the theater long before they have seen the entire programme because the offering of to-day fatally resembles the attraction of yesterday. Even the children down in front are able to guess with deadly correctness the development of the average plot and the exact details of the finish. They only have to see the first two hundred feet of the film to foretell the middle and the end. Scarcely less numerous are the instances where the plot is obscure and complicated and the picture fails to arouse any emotion except impatience, disgust, annoyance and exasperation. There are altogether too many pictures in which the appeal is made to the lowest intelligence. An attempt to force the sympathy of an audience by making a little child suffer hardships or perform deeds of heroism cannot be condemned too severely. The average intelligent audience turns from such antics with a feeling of physical nausea. This "child-business" is overdone so badly that we often have to watch three or four of these "chee-ild" reels in one evening. This is more than human nature can endure. No sane person can be induced to permanently part with ten cents for the privilege of looking at impossible infantile heroics. There are other stereotyped figures fully as objectionable but it would exceed the space alloted to this article nor would it add anything to the comfort of either the writer or reader to delineate them in all their horrors. Enough has been said to make the meaning plain to those manufacturers who offend most. It takes neither money or brains to produce these kind of films and the manufacturer who makes them is always sure of at least a little return on his money. The existence of these films, however, works a distinct hardship and injustice on the exhibitor.

Of course we do not in the least doubt the vitality of the motion picture as such. No one judges the quality of wax by the impressions which are made upon it. The impressions disappear, but the wax remains, ready to receive any impression.

In England it is a common saying that in America everything is "the largest in the world." This exaggeration, or boast, seems to have been made good, according to Pathe's Weekly No. 30, which shows "the largest flag in the world." Of course, it is the "Stars and Stripes,' 'and is described as weighing 800 pounds, and measuring 135 x 75 feet. Is this a defiance for some other country to surpass? Young America everywhere will want to see and applaud this flag; what a volume of sound if all would be heard at once. Perhaps the subject most interesting to this page is that of the unveiling of the statue erected to the memory of the explorer, Champlain, which is another incident of importance to the history of that beautiful part of New York State, and which also is of interest to the whole country.

Plays of the Hour

By Louis Reeves Harrison

WHO shall say what is written in the hearts of men? We can tell pretty nearly what is going on in the breasts of those aldermen, State legislators and members of Congress who are responsible for the special privileges granted corporations and private individuals of little or no conscience. The degradation of representative assemblies may not in itself furnish high dramatic material, but how about the gradual change visible in a man who enters politics with expressed good intentions and emerges in the tragedy of disgrace or the farcial security of wealth accumulated from the vilest sources? The temptations to which he is subjected lead to situations of suspense and can be presented in a form fascinatingly sensational.

The grinding of all sense of honor into the suffocating dust of corruption between an upper and lower legislative body in the course of their compromises would be highly entertaining as well as educational to the people who put men into office for better purposes. If vice has come to be inevitable in our form of government why not lay it bare on the screen that the millions of people who go to the little theaters may know what we are up against. The interest in such plays would be deep-seated if they were presented with sincerity and power, especially to the great masses who have been ineffectually striving for equal justice with special privileges to none.

Every lesson that the newspapers are enforcing editorially in commenting on conditions that exist and in striving to stimulate a better spirit in legislation can be thrown on the screen in powerful dramatic presentation with far-reaching effect. The hypocrisy in law-making and the idiocy in law enforcement offer hundreds of interesting subjects to the playwright and would stir the bosoms of millions in whom the resentment of injustice is burning.

Wrongs stand unrighted and big crimes go unpunished before our very eyes, while litigation has become so costly that it is a luxury to be indulged in only by those who have the price of attorneys and their unlimited greed to expend without personal destruction. This binds the poor tighter than ever to their poverty, enslaving them in a condition more pitiable in its contrasts than that so often shown of Russian serfdom. There is pathos a-plenty in the arbitrary destruction of all that industrious and honest men and women can save. Throw light on it.

A play of my own was rejected because I pictured a priest as a man, as a human creature. The story was simply a revolt against the mediæval estimate of man that depicted him as supernaturally good or helplessly corrupt and was actuated by the spirit of the modern age in its more enlightened valuation of human character, but I was told that it might offend a certain sect. Sects are permitted rather than authorized for whatever worth and goodness they possess. We turn our backs upon no faith that conforms with the best aspirations of human kind, our people may seek light according to their light, but religion, like man, is subject to change and growth —I could not help seeing that blind reliance on dramatic tradition was at the bottom of such bigotry. Literature clear back to the bible itself and inclusive shows man in his upward struggle between two inner forces, priests along with the others.

The humanizing play may openly deal with the contrast between practice and profession without lowering any of our ideals—no reason exists why we should follow false lights. The priest in the photoplay fell and rose again in the course of action, the effect being more powerful because of his cloth, and the motive was ennobling. Sense the motive in selecting any play. Its ultimate significance is more important than plot or characterization.

Spiritual freedom may be only a dream, but it is a dream that is universal. It may only be constrasted poetically with the recent discoveries of science or in extreme farce comedy. It is now claimed that our souls are mere chemical resultants. Great opportunity for roaring comedy! Equally great for mysterious tragedy on the lines of Stevenson's famous novel, "Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." Some recent scientific discoveries afford the richest kind of veins of comedy, and those who do not like to strain their minds with actual study need not go further than the Sunday supplements for data. Other discoveries furnish materials for stories of deep interest if they are not strictly educational.

An Edison director of ability remarked the other day that "scenario writers"—it is thus that men furnishing the initiative are ignominiously dubbed—should give closer attention to constructive requirements after making a careful study of plays thrown on the screen, and no one questions the honesty of his statement, but there is a painful lack of incentive for those who already understand the construction of photoplays to write scenarios. If directors who are fairly well paid to visualize what authors write would display some fraternal generosity in urging just compensation for original scripts of telling motive characterization and plot the dearth of good plays might be transformed to opulence in the twinkling of an eyelash. Plays of the hour are not to be had for the asking.

Given anything like the incentive afforded those who act in and direct the conduct of photodramas, the "scenario writer," merely the man who meets with the high creative requirements of a timely and perfectly constructed screen story, may range politics, religion and science for new and strong themes, he may invade the radiant fields of modern philosophy and adorn his creative work with poetic beauty, but his physical elimination at present rates would only be a matter of days unless he had some other means of feeding the furnace of thought. We need rarely expect these plays of the hour from men directing their full energies to production.

Questions of showmanship and craftsmanship are now becoming involved in all departments. Moving pictures have worked slowly backward from the mere exhibition of motion, through amateurish presentations, to professional direction and stage management of men and women capable of accurate impersonation to the tiny fountain head of the drama, and the rivers bid fair to run dry from lack of unfailing springs. The exhaustion of these means fatally uninteresting exhibitions lacking in vigor and variety.

Believing sincerely that the play of the hour will be the result of composite effort I may be pardoned for standing out for the principles involved. There is a business end to the marketing of photoplays, there is an intervening selective taste to be exercised, the director has to do with the thousand and one things that make a play go, stagecraft is an essential, and the end must be an effect originally conceived in the mind of a capable author. We must not only be interested and entertained, but we must get something of value from the photodrama of the hour.

"Undine" (Thanhouser)

Reviewed by G. F. Blaisdell.

FOR a year and a century the romance of Undine has been the possession of the reading world. When Friederich Fouqué, the Baron de la Motte, penned the lines of this singularly dramatic story, this weaving together of the imaginary and the real, this tale of the spirits and the mortals, the noted German poet could not have hoped to reach for an audience more than a few, comparatively speaking. His best was to paint a picture of words, in cold type, leaving to the varying imaginative powers of his readers the conception of the settings, the scenes, the participants. Could the Baron, like the Spirit of the Brook, be summoned back to earth for a view of the delightful, the artistic, interpretation of his masterpiece that has been produced by the Thanhouser Company he would probably take pleasure in confessing that he had builded better than he knew; he would see his audience increased by tens, by hundreds, of thousands.

It is in such plays as "Undine" that the advantage of the screen over the stage is greatest. The mechanics of motion pictures are as easily adapted to the portrayal of spirit as of mortal life and habitation. The Thanhouser company has won an enviable reputation for careful portrayal. "Undine" will measurably fortify that reputation. It is a production that will particularly appeal to followers of the motion picture—to those who see many pictures, the product of all groups, domestic and foreign. The action throughout the two reels is uniformly smooth; there is never a question as to who is who or what is what. If this most desirable result in any measure may be ascribed to the plenitude of subtitles they will thereby serve as their own justification. The photography is on a level with the general production—it is finished.

It is of course plainly apparent to thoughtful persons that in a picture of this description, wherein pictorial effects figure so largely, the great credit for results must inevitably go to the director. Flo La Badie takes the title role, and she is charming. William Russell plays the Spirit of the Brook, and he is dignified and impressive. His work stands out. James Cruze has the part of the knight and Marguerite Snow that of Bertalda. The entire company is at its best.

There is a wealth of incident to grip the attention of the beholder. The initial scene is a bold conception. It serves to awaken the interest. A half dozen or more maidens are sporting about a mass of rocks. Suddenly they plunge into the sea and swim to a lone boulder only the top of which is visible. Undine swims back to shore and with curious gaze closely watches a pair of lovers who are strolling about. She decides that she wants to live on the earth. Back forthwith she goes to the caverns of the deep and seeks permission to return. Old Neptune grants it. Undine, in her unacquaintance with the world, appeals to the Spirit of the Brook, and that servant, who so faithfully waits on her throughout the drama, guides her to the home of the fisherman. As the two are crossing a brook at the foot of a series of waterfalls the Spirit vanishes. Undine is received with open arms by the fisherman and his wife. She becomes one of the family. We see her at sunset as she goes down to the sea and affectionately greets her foster father as he comes ashore in his dory—a charming picture.

In the imperial city, standing by a great open air staircase, surrounded by finely costumed men and women, a knight wagers with Lady Bertalda that he dares not ride into the enchanted forest at night. The Lady Bertalda is in love with the knight. Huldbrand sets out. As night descends the horseman is beset by fear of the strange creatures that inhabit the trees. He seeks shelter at the cottage of the fisherman. It is Undine who responds to the knock. She converses with the knight, who explains his situation. Undine calls her foster mother, who bids the knight enter. It is interesting to watch the bearing of the water sprite as she talks with the stranger.

For many days the knight lingers at the cottage by the sea. It is the old, old story. Undine goes to the brook to seek the consent of the Spirit to become the bride of the knight. At the appearance of the apparition the suitor of Undine assumes a very unknightly demeanor. He is badly frightened. The consent is granted. The knight takes Undine in his arms across the brook in front of the falls and kisses her. The following day the knight and his bride ride forth to the city.

On the great steps in front of the palatial mansion many persons are grouped. Bertalda is there. The knight explains to her why he has been absent so long and points out his wife. The Lady Bertalda shows her anger and jealousy. The men congratulate the knight. The happy pair proceed to their home. From the fountain that continually plays in the garden the Spirit of the Brook arises to bless them. The news extends through the fountain to the caverns beneath the sea, and there is great rejoicing over the happiness of Undine.

Lady Bertalda has not given up hope of winning the knight in spite of his marriage with the former water sprite. She lavishes her attentions on Huldbrand. He begins to neglect Undine. In the beautiful garden of her home, standing by the fountain, banked in ferns, the Spirit of the Brook, mysteriously informed of the turn domestic affairs were taking in that household, appears to Undine. Undine flies to his arms. The Spirit is in a rage. To protect her husband from the wrath of the Spirit of the Brook, Undine directs that the fountain be sealed. She entreats the knight not to venture on the water. Urged by Bertalda, the knight disregards the warning. In a great boat he and Bertalda set out. They are no sooner away from shore than from alongside the boat many pairs of hands extend out of the water. It is an uncanny sight. The knight and Bertalda shrink in horror into the stern of the boat. Undine in her anguish returns to Old Neptune and the Spirit of the Brook.

In the absence from her earthly home of the former water sprite, Bertalda receives a clear field. She makes full use of her opportunities. It is not many months before the betrothal of Bertalda and her old lover is announced. Undine, disconsolate in her cavern beneath the waves, sees in a vision the change in the affairs of the knight. Bertalda, secure in her position as the future mistress of the knight's mansion, orders the fountain unsealed. Then, through the waters of the restored ornament, word is carried to Undine of the approaching marriage. She prepares for a journey.

Surrounded by great masses of roses, Bertalda is joined in marriage to her old lover. There is a large party present at the ceremony. While the assembled guests have been following the responses of the bride and bridegroom, Undine comes out of the fountain and walks about the grounds of her old home. Just as the marriage ceremony is concluded she appears in front of the knight. Huldbrand slowly goes to her as if drawn by an irresistible attraction. A moment later he falls, dead. Undine goes out by the fountain. Slowly she fades from view. She reappears in the caverns of the deep. We see her kneeling in prayer.

A solemn procession escorts the body of the knight to the tomb. Undine, unseen, is there. She falls behind as the cortege enters the granite structure. She leans on the window sill and gazes into the building. As night falls Lady Bertalda is led away. For a moment Undine goes to the door of the tomb. Then she returns to the little fountain which has played so important a part in her tragedy of life. She stands in front of it and then gradually fades.

Mist gathers. Slowly developing from it appear massive fountains, the water rising from them in great undulating waves.

PREPARATIONS FOR N. Y. EXHIBITORS' BALL.

The Reception and Ball Committee of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York is still busy on the job of rounding up features for the second annual entertainment and ball to be given at the Palm Garden on Thursday evening, Nov. 14th, by the Exhibitors' League.

As previously announced in these columns, Mr. A. Coleman, chairman of the committee, has secured the promise of the Hon. John A. Dix, governor of New York, to be present. Senator Jos. B. Foraker, of Ohio, counsel for the National League of Exhibitors, will surely be in attendance, Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, will also be on hand. It has also been stated that a number of the Selig acting forces will come on from Chicago to take part in the olio proceeding the dance. Pop Lubin and party from Philadelphia will come over, including Arthur Johnson and others of the acting department who will appear in the olio.

Mr. Coleman desires to announce, through our columns, the additional features he has secured, consisting of the Vitagraph collection of notables who will appear on the bill or at the ball or both. Those who will be there are: Miss Florence Turner, Edith Storey, Lillian Walker, Flora Finch, Kate Price & Co., Mrs. Mary Maurice, Adele De Garde, John Bunny, Ralph Ince, Leo Delaney, Van Dyke Brooke, Kenneth Casey, Harry Mayo and others of the Vitagraph players.

The grand march will be led by Mr. Maurice Costello and Miss Florence Lawrence. Other famous photo players will be announced later.

Exhibitors and others should bear in mind that this affair is being given partly as a means of raising funds to defray the expenses of the national convention of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to be held at New York during the summer of 1913. All New York State exhibitors are invited to participate in and feel that the function will be just as much a state affair as it is a local one.

BILKALEM VISITS "UNCLE JOHN."

A few weeks ago Bilkalem journeyed for a week's vacation up to the classic precincts of Haines Fall, N. Y., where "Uncle John" Rusk runs the Wauwanda picture theater. Readers of the WORLD will recall the description of this unique rural house owned by Rusk and Andrews. Bilkalem was delighted with the locality and equally pleased with the Wauwanda theater. The accompanying cut is from a photograph taken by Bilkalem and shows a picturesque view of the house.

John Bunny Abroad

The Man Who Has Made Millions Laugh, Relates His European Experiences in the Making of "Pickwick Papers."

By Hugh Hoffman.

ON September 7th the steamer "Berlin" warped into her dock in New York City with her water line two inches below sea level. Mr. John Bunny, the famous heavyweight comedian of the Vitagraph Company, was on board. Mr. Bunny sometimes jocularly speaks of his success as a triumph of avoirdupois. But anyone who is fairly well acquainted with him knows that his success is really due to superior mentality and long years of experience. Mr. Bunny and party, consisting of Lawrence Trimble, director; a cameraman, and his son, George Bunny, were returning from a three-months' sojourn in Europe, where they went with the specific object of doing some of the scenes from "Pickwick Papers," with Mr. Bunny in the role of Mr. Pickwick. A day or two later the writer had the pleasure of a long chat with the rotund comedian, quite alone in the Vitagraph greenroom, after all the others had departed for the day. Mr. Bunny was overflowing with enthusiasm over his European excursion and for two hours poured out the most interesting of anecdotes which we are only too sorry cannot be given here in full.

As to motion picture making, the jovial John declares that he is many times wiser than he was when he left these shores. Obstacles of many kinds began to appear almost from the beginning, but he states with a certain amount of pride that they were all met and overcome. The principal difficulty encountered was bad weather. The English climate is, of course, well known for its drawbacks, photographically speaking. Then there were the customs of the people to be learned; their habits and the diplomacy required for obtaining concessions of various kinds.

John Bunny is a picture fan of the first-water. He has been thoroughly weaned away from the stage and his crowning ambition is to make moving pictures of the reliable kind. He loves accuracy and authenticity. He believes that the works of famous authors should be translated into pictures at the original locations where the events are supposed to have taken place. The costumes, he believes, should be not only correct, but, as far as possible, should be those actually made and worn during the period of the story.

JOHN BUNNY.

"The making of Pickwick," he said, "has been one of my fondest dreams for several years. It has been my desire to reproduce in pictures the famous character of Pickwick amid the very scenes of which Dickens wrote, and I think when these pictures we have made are shown to the public it will be said that our work has not been in vain.

"Before doing 'Pickwick' we did a picture entitled 'Bunny at the Derby.' We had only two days of preparation for this, having heard upon landing that the Derby would be run at Epsom Downs, the next day but one. We did some scrambling to get ready for that picture which would show the famous English Derby as a background. I appeared as a costermonger with donkey and cart. We had no actors engaged and we were obliged to act in all capacities. We had to be managers, authors, directors, property men, booking agents, stage managers, wardrobe people, diplomats, financiers and the rest of the list all in the same day.

"I never shall forget my experience as a costermonger at the Derby. No one expected us and yet nearly everybody among the thousands assembled there knew me at a glance when I appeared upon the track in my donkey cart. A howl of delight went up from thousands of throats when they spied me, and one girl, who had seen me often in moving pictures, when she came face to face with the living image of the apparition she had seen upon the screen so often, she exclaimed: 'My God, mither, 'tiz th' movin' picthur' mon!'

"While in England we did three of the adventures of Mr. Pickwick. The first was the coach ride to Rochester. For the making of this picture we were fortunate enough to find the original coach and harness that were used to make the daily trip in the days of Pickwick. In this picture we used also the original home of Mrs. Bardell in Goswell Street. We tried to find one of the two-wheeled cabs such as were in vogue when Pickwick papers were written, but no such vehicle existed except one that is in the British Museum. This the Museum authorities would not allow us to use; therefore we had an exact replica made of it and this vehicle appears frequently in the pictures. Arriving at Rochester we found the Bull's Head Inn and made excellent use of it as a background. While we were in and about Rochester the city was practically turned over to us and the enormous crowd that gathered each day to watch us work, required nearly the entire police force of Rochester to keep it at the proper distance. Anything we wanted we could have and the Mayor and police force were even solicitous to see that everything was exactly as we wished it to be.

"The second reel we did was the hunting expedition of Pickwick and his friends. It may be well to say just here that all of the cast, excepting myself, were English actors, selected by me in London. The two selected for the parts of Alfred Jingle and Mr. Snodgrass could not have been better if they had stepped out of one of Cruickshank's illustrations. The part of Sam Weller was also admirably handled by a very clever English comedian. This second reel includes the well-known wheelbarrow episode on Captain Bolding's estate. We had almost as much fun in doing these scenes as the public, I am sure, will find in them.

"The third of the Pickwick series was the imaginary elopement which the rogue Job Trotter confessed to Mr. Pickwick would take place that evening when Alfred Jingle was to elope with a young lady from the select seminary for young ladies. We waited for a good rainstorm for these scenes and you may be sure that Pickwick got a very fine ducking.

"From London we went to Dublin and then to Paris and Berlin. We went to France and Germany for recreation and to look over the ground to get ideas for scenarios to be used on our next trip. I found myself better known than I had any right to expect.

"I was rather amused at the various names by which I am known on the Continent. In Paris they don't know me as Bunny, but as 'Monsieur Cinema.' In Berlin I am known everywhere as 'Herr Kintop'; in Russia as 'Pockson,' the latter being a slang term of endearment much on the order of our American expression, 'Sunny Jim.' I was surprised to find the Paris plant of the Vitagraph Company to be much larger than the home plant at Brooklyn.

"We were gone exactly three months, and during my absence in foreign countries I could see enough work laid out ahead of me to keep me busy for a hundred years. I hope the public will like our efforts in 'Pickwick' and that their approval will be our warrant to return again to England and complete the picture version of that exquisite comedy creation of Charles Dicken's—'The Pickwick Papers.'"

"The Black Chancellor."

(Three-Reel Great Northern Feature.)

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is one of a large and interesting class of plays of the "Prisoner of Zenda" type, whose charm resides in its ingenious and entertaining improbability, the author not despising truth, but making it subsidiary to delightfulness. There is an infusion of fantasy in "The Black Chancellor" that holds from beginning to end—it is just like reading a good story, and if the story is good mighty few care whether it is true or not. It is so like the "Prisoner of Zenda," which Edwin Rose fashioned out of Anthony Hope's famous novel in the wealth of its perilous adventure, in its diplomatic intrigue, and in its chivalrous defense of true love that it exercises much the same fascination of visual appeal as the play that drew all New York to the theater.

The scene is that of one of those imaginary sovereignties which are supposed to exist in or near the Carpathian mountains and invariably have for nominal ruler a lovely Princess, but are actually dominated by a military despot in the person of a Chancellor. The Black Chancellor, a gentleman by the name of Rallenstein, is only formally respectful to Princess Irene and rules with an iron hand both the military and the people. Arbitrary with officers, impatient with court servitors, a tyrant wherever he can exercise his power, he the hateful evil spirit of the piece.

Princess Irene is in truth a beautiful woman and a patrician to her finger tips. Quite in the natural course of things she is beloved by a real man, splendid Lieutenant Parlow, and she responds in full, but the Chancellor has many cards to play against her heart's desire beside the good of her country and the honor of her house. He has the military at his disposal, he enjoys the blind devotion of a clever young officer of the Hussars named Captain Rocowitz and has made him his aide de camp in deviltry, and he is conspiring with a powerful neighbor, Prince Zoba, to further the latter's suit with lovely Princess Irene.

The Princess is really enmeshed in a net when the play opens, but is so unsuspicious of the scheming and plotting all around her that she receives Lieutenant Parlow at her palace apartment in the presence of Theodora, her maid of honor and most intimate friend. Parlow is a magnificent specimen of young manhood, so far as physical appearance goes, but is so wedded to military life and discipline that his heroic qualities are those destined to shine most brilliantly on the field of battle. He is too good-natured and simple of purpose for court intrigues, and he is so trained to the hour in the profession of his choice that he is willing to accept any form of death imposed by the interests of the country he has sworn to defend.

He and the Princess Irene are billing and cooing in her reception room when the keen-eared Theodora hears the steps of the Chancellor without—he is lame—and Irene rashly induces Lieutenant Parlow to hide behind convenient portieres. Enter the crafty and observing Chancellor. He brings the written proposal of Prince Zoba and smilingly awaits its acceptance. Princess Irene declines with such emphasis that an explanation becomes necessary, and she informs the Black Chancellor with childish simplicity that she loves another. He thus learns what she might have concealed. He waits outside the door when the interview is closed and hears a man's voice. He knocks again. When he is admitted no man is present. Under the pretext that he dropped some trivial object, he reaches beneath the portieres and discovers what he suspected.

On his return to his own rooms in the palace the Chancellor sends his handsome aide de camp, Captain Rocowitz, to the chambers of the Princess for Lieutenant Parlow. When the latter is brought into the presence of his superior officer he is made the messenger to carry the Chancellor's reply of acceptance to Prince Zoba, a morsel of fiendish cruelty that completely upsets the honorable Parlow. He is made aware that the Princess is not for him. Worse, he is marked for death as an officer who dishonored his profession. Under the servitude of military discipline his career is virtually at an end.

Irene now becomes informed of the status of affairs and goes at its solution with the direct simplicity that has characterized her conduct from the outset. She calls upon her religious adviser and arranges with him to marry her to Parlow during the time when the court ball is in progress. While she is dancing with the man she loves at the ball she feigns sudden illness and is conducted by her partner to where they are to meet Theodora and Parlow's intimate friend—a real hero—Lieutenant Growblewsky—it might be well to leave off the "steins," "vitzs" and "skys" in pictures for this market.

These four go to the church, but they are shadowed by the Chancellor's aide de camp. He returns and informs the Chancellor. They are temporarily outwitted by Cupid, for the young couple are united in marriage before they can interfere. The arch-villain is foiled, but he resorts to an extreme measure in military discipline. He not only decides that all witnesses to the marriage of the Princess must be killed, but sends Captain Rocowitz to Lieutenant Parlow with a military sentence of death. The young officer who has clandestinely married the Princess must destroy himself according to the code. He is encountered in the corridors of the palace and offered a vial of poison at the point of a revolver. He takes the poison and sinks down in the preliminary throes of death. Rocowitz hurries away to report the fatal incident. The crime is, however, witnessed from a gallery by Theodora and she sends the heroic Growblewsky to the aid of his friend. It thus happens that the Chancellor is not afforded a chance to witness the final death struggles of the newly-made bridegroom, and his rage is frightful to behold. Rocowitz is accused of treachery and sets out in pursuit of the two lieutenants—they have gone with a physician to Growblewsky's castle. He sees them through his glasses and sends a messenger to the dreadful Chancellor relating what has occurred.

The Black Chancellor now resorts to extreme measures. He has the coachman of the Princess drugged and in this way has her conveyed to the castle of Rocowitz, a stronghold having the outer characteristics of a veritable fortress. The exteriors have all been fine up to this point and they now assume a romantic interest rarely seen in plays of any description. The aspect of the moats and walls of an old castle lends powerfully to the imagination in both interiors and exteriors that follow.

With the groom disabled and the bride incarcerated a situation is set up that requires both heroism and ingenuity to solve. Lieutenant Growblewsky is the man of the hour. While carrying a message from Parlow to the Princess, he comes upon her dazed coachman and learns of her abduction. He sets off on horse like one of those romantic heroes of old to fight his way single-handed. He hears from a peddler in a tavern what gives him a clue and has no trouble in enlisting the peddler's services. The latter has been beaten by Rocowitz and is anxious to get even with his proud young assailant.

These ill-assorted adventurers swim the moat of the castle and come upon a veritable secret entrance, whose existence became known to the peddler through his intrigue with a housemaid. They descend beneath the lofty walls and creep through an underground passage for a long distance, finally emerging in a room that has no apparent exit. They grope about the walls until they come upon a spring, which throws open a door leading directly into the room where the Princess is confined.

The action becomes more animated every moment. Rocowitz learns of the daring invasion of his castle and gathers his retainers to cut off all avenues of escape, but the heroic young friend of the groom has foreseen all contingencies—he has sent a message to the revived groom himself. When rescuers and rescued come out of the castle gates, fighting every inch of the way with swords and pistols, they meet a supporting force from without. A hot conflict ensues, but a carriage is in waiting and the persecuted Princess is carried away to a final triumph.

Her people have been aroused at last to the infamy of the Black Chancellor, and even the troops are in such a state of insubordination that the cavalry—a fine body of men and horses—appears on the outskirts of town and acts as escort for the now-triumphant Princess. As she passes under gate after gate, the people acclaim her return with joy. She is as much beloved as the Black Chancellor is hated.

What of him?

He seeks refuge with the Prince Zoba, but is coldly received as a failure. While he struggling to re-establish himself in high favor with the Prince he exhibits the suffering of a man in the last stages of fatal disease. His time has come. This is emphasized by a message from his most faithful officer. Rocowitz has cast his die and lost, but he saves himself and leaves the country with a message to the Chancellor advising the latter to kill himself. Destiny settles his fate. He recoils under this last blow and dies in the chambers of Prince Zoba.

The costumes of officers and ladies in this royal play are of striking brilliancy, but still more interesting and beautiful are the exterior scenes. These are chosen with high artistic taste. The story itself is clean in motive. Love is powerful enough to overcome the evil designs of the Black Chancellor, and the types are so admirably chosen that our sympathies are enlisted on the right side. Princess Flavia in the "Prisoner of Zenda" says,

"If love were all!"

Princess Irene responds, in the "Black Chancellor,"

"Love is all!"

GROWTH IN MORAL PERFECTION AND STRENGTH.

It is now more than a year since any criticism of moral weakness or obliquity in the picture has been expressed in these pages.

This growth out of those occasions for such criticism was expected and predicted. A higher grade of picture, feature films, educational topics and an improved personnel, are each in part responsible for this improvement. The writer has never been able to give credit to censorship for any advance towards perfection. A watch-dog has nothing to do with the increased value of the contents of the house; neither is a policeman responsible for the moral and intellectual advancement of the community.

Higher aims, culture and educational progress alone are the causes for this commendable condition. The old saying that "water rises to the height of its source" is often verified. The organ of inspiration to any body of people has large responsibilities, in that it often becomes the source from which many draw their own standard of morals or efficiency. When that source is carefully and thoroughly prepared, it must follow that its example and precepts will tell upon those dependent upon it.

That the moving picture has had high ideals always placed before it, with large possibilities anticipated consequent thereupon; it is no longer surprising it should grow in moral strength and protection. Having arrived at this stage it must without any pride, yet with justifiable self-respect, prepare to take its place as a teacher of those same principles which have brought it to its present standing, with the added powers in other and large fields of its unlimited curriculum.

WARNER GETTING IN RIGHT.

Announcement is made that Mr. A. Warner, who has been trading under the title "Warner's Features," has secured control of a modern and fully equipped studio and manufacturing plant in New York City, which will be used in the production of feature pictures to be handled exclusively by his concern. On the strength of that acquisition Mr. Warner has caused his interests to be incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. The incorporated company will be known as Warner's Feature Film Company and is capitalized for $100,000.

MR. A. WARNER.

Through the acquisition of a New York studio and factory, working in conjunction with the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, now under contract to turn out one western subject each month, the Warner Feature Film Company is now assured of two features every month. In addition to this output Mr. Warner has contracted for the product of a foreign manufacturer of merit. The first release for September appeared on the 16th, entitled "Peril of the Plains" and is reviewed at length on page 1167—this issue.

Arrangements have been made with the Gaumont Company, through its representative, A. C. Bromhead, now in New York, to place all Warner's features through that company's exchanges in Canada.

LOTH BUILDING THEATER CHANGES OWNERS.

The Loth Building Theater, 1828 Amsterdam Avenue, New York, was purchased recently by Gilbert R. Waterbury from Mr. Charles R. Letts. The Loth Building Theater was the first moving picture house on Washington Heights, and did a long and prosperous business under the Letts regime. The policy of the house will remain the same as heretofore. and the same staff of employees will continue, including Mr. Jack Tonkins, chief operator.

TO STOP THE PIRATES.

Legitimate feature film concerns all over the country are making a concerted effort to stop the pirating of their films by resorting to the courts.

The Feature and Educational Film Company of Cleveland, the Universal Features of New York, the Century Film Company of Springfield, Mass.; the Tournament Film Company of Toledo, and the Mutual Film Corporation have started in the work. Attorneys for all of these companies are busy gathering evidence and starting suits. The F. & E. Company is now fighting two suits, one in Milwaukee and one in Cleveland, and two concerns in Chicago and one in New York, it is reported, will shortly find themselves defendants in copyright law suits.

The F. & E. Company has issued a warning to all concerns claiming to sell and book films which it controls and an affidavit has been sent with the warning.

Doings at Los Angeles

Many Extensive Improvements Being Made in Picture Studios—Regulating Operators.

EXTENSIVE improvements are in progress at three of the motion picture studios in this city. A large force of workmen is now engaged in erecting the new buildings at the plant of the Brand Advanced Motion Picture Co., located on a 40-acre tract in the San Fernando valley near the town of Burbank. The Universal people are spending a great deal of money on their new outdoor studio at Oak Crest near Los Angeles, where they have bought and leased a tract consisting in all of about 20,000 acres and are planning to build the largest motion picture plant in the world. James Young Deer, director of the Pathe Western company, has practically concluded the negotiations for the purchase of 35 acres of land at Edendale and architects are now at work on the plants for his studio, which if it will not be the largest in the world will be one of the most modern and one of the best equipped.

Preparations are also being made at Edendale for radical changes and extensions of the old Bison plant of the New York Motion Picture Co. Charles O. Baumann and A. Kessel are here from New York for a personal inspection of the plant and Mack Sennet, the director of the new Keystone company, preceded them by a couple of days. Sennet, with the assistance of Mabel Normand, Henry Lehrmann and Ford Sterling, who came from New York with him, and Fred Mace, former director of Imp comedies, is already at work at the Edendale plant making comedies for future release. The balance of the company was employed here, being recruited from the ranks of other companies on the ground. Fred Balshofer has announced that there are to be two Western releases a week by Ince and Ford, two split reel comedies, one by Sennet and the other by Mace, and one dramatic by a director who is coming on in a few days, but whose identity is not to be revealed at this time. It is reported that Baumann and Kessel, before they return to New York, may have other important revelations to make.

Regulating Operators.

The city regulations affecting motion picture operators employed in the theaters of this city are occupying the attention of the city authorities at the present time and there is a possibility that the existing ordinance may be amended in a manner that will set a precedent for other cities of the United States.

The duty of examining applicants for licenses to operate projecting machines in the local theaters has devolved upon R. H. Manahan, the city electrician, who has come to the conclusion that there is something radically wrong with the present system, but hasn't quite made up his mind about what is needed to improve it.

The existing ordinance is a slipshod measure which merely provides that operators shall be required to take out licenses before being employed in picture houses and that such licenses shall be granted only to those who are competent. The practice is for the applicants to appear before the city electrician, who puts them through a simple verbal examination and issues the license if he is satisfied. The percentage of those who are rejected is small and the fellow who is turned down usually has so little knowledge of his business that he doesn't dare make an issue of his rejection. Manahan tells me he is looking for a better and more scientific method and incidentally is trying to persuade the purchasing department to authorize him to obtain instruments and apparatus necessary for a serious examination. He is also advocating an ordinance fixing 21 years as the minimum age for operators.

A recently published statement which emanated presumably from the headquarters of the Universal company, to the effect that Frank Montgomery, one of the Universal directors at the present time, is the man who made Bison films what they are to-day, has provoked a loud roar from Fred J. Balshofer, vice-president and general manager of the New York Motion Picture Company. Mr. Balshofer wants a chance to tell the people who are in the motion picture industry that, without casting any reflection on the ability of Mr. Montgomery or the veracity of the officials of the Universal Film Company, most of the credit is due to Tom Ince and Mr. Ford. Mr. Montgomery was only with the Bison company for a short time, Mr. Balshofer says, and did not join until the quality of Bison films had been pretty well established. Montgomery is now with the Universal people and is engaged in directing the pictures which are being released by the Universal company under the brand "Bison," formerly controlled by the New York Motion Picture Company.

Harry Revier, director of the Revier Laboratories, has gone to San Francisco on some mysterious mission connected with motion pictures, and also, in some way, connected with the Universal company's plans, according to report. It was said when he left that his business might take him to Oregon before his return and that he may establish a permanent company somewhere in the Northern lakes, streams and pine woods.

Mae Marsh, formerly leading woman with the Biograph company and later leading woman with the Kalem Glendale company, has gone to New York to rejoin the Biograph forces. She will work in Director Griffith's company. Miss Loveridge, who was also with the Biograph players for a time, went with her.

POWELL.

DEATH OF BAXTER MORTON.

We learn with deep regret of the passing of Baxter Morton, who died on Tuesday, September 3, 1912, aged 37 years. Mr. Morton became severely ill last November; since then he has not been active in business. His death occurred at the home of his family at Falls Church, Va.

To those whose daily labors brought them in close contact with this man, his passing brings a desolation which only the loss of a friend can cause. Genial and modest in disposition, with a courtesy that Northern environments never blunted, sympathetic to a degree and with a patience which stood all trials, it may indeed be said of him that

The Late Baxter Morton.

"His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the World, 'This was a man.'"

There are many who, like the writer, can speak of the cheery smile, the kindly word and the helping hand which was extended in the hour of need; and for whom the journey of life has been rendered less hard because Baxter Morton lived. The deceased was a patent attorney by profession and was connected with the Nicholas Power Company.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE AT SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Mr. A. F. Smith, proprietor of the Edisonia, at Springfield, Mass., opened on August 31 a new moving picture theater called the Mirror, in Winchester Square, Springfield. Mr. A. W. Atkins, Mr. Smith's manager at the Mirror, says that he is turning away large crowds nightly. Both of Mr. Smith's houses are equipped with the Mirror Screen.

The Mills of the Gods.

Three-Reel Vitagraph Production.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

HERE are some new names, some new faces, some new judicious sprinkling of those tried and not found and interesting personalities, although there is a wanting, and there is more than one "discovery" among the actors and actresses assigned to this play.

Giulia	Rosemary Theby
Miguel	Leo Delaney
Lorenzo	Roger Lytton
Maria	Zena Kiefe
Pietro	Tefft Johnson
She-Wolf	Evelyn Dominicus
Tano	George Cooper
De Waldis	Harry Northrup
Rosa	Adele de Garde

By new and interesting personalities, I do not mean that the parts are taken by people wholly unknown, but that this play has given them opportunity to reveal what they can do. George Cooper has been seen a great many times in minor roles, but here responds to one of higher emotional value in a way that should be encouraging to himself and those who afford him a chance. The "Maria" of Zena Kiefe is a delicate and consistent piece of acting, and the performance of Leo Delaney may astonish his best friends. The stars, however, are Rosemary Theby and Roger Lytton. Lytton is not only a perfect type, but he handles every moment of his difficult role with that carrying intensity which fastens attention.

Lytton makes his villainous role one of fascination for the beholder. There are no passive moments while he is within the scope of the camera, and I do not mean by that any form of useless action. He is the character he represents, a man who has attained wealth and power without emerging from the primitive egotism and low passion that the human creature brought with him in his rise from a lower to a higher state. Lorenzo in the pictured story is a type of man existing in our midst, a clear visioned financier of tremendous force and determination who is a moral idiot. We recognize in this interpretation the men we see in leather-covered office chairs directing the destinies of hundreds of their fellow-beings whom they would destroy to gratify passions which nobler men control.

Opposed to him is the wit of a woman of some worldly experience with heart unspoiled, and the play would have risen to lofty proportions by amplification of the struggle between these two. It is belittled by melodramatic and mechanical details. We instinctively look for a duel to the death between these two characters. I cannot help saying that Rosemary Theby is fortunate. She has a natural endowment of tremendous value—the beauty she radiates speaks well for those who brought her into the world and nourished with intelligence her inheritance of grace and charm. Every moment of Miss Theby's performance is satisfying to the artistic eye except her expression of grief. She had better rely upon posture in moments of sorrow.

The performance of these two leaders with their admirable support and the wonderfully accurate settings—I suppose they were selected by Ralph Ince—carry over to success a play whose motive belongs to darker ages than this. Revenge still stalks among us when the bitter desire to injure an enemy is carried out in violence under the dominance of mad passions, or even when it is construed in retaliation for a wrong, real or fancied, done by a superior in office or society, but men of to-day do not cherish a malignant hatred over a period of ten years because a tavern waitress has slighted them. We cannot imagine a man who has acquired the security of wealth and position disguising himself to go out and commit a string of crimes for any such trivial reason. If we knew of any we would laugh at him or tell him to forget it.

Before a novel of other days is put into such dramatic form that it may be used in moving pictures I should think it would be a good idea for the adapter to sense the situation, to study it from a modern point of view, for that is sure to be the view of the audience to be entertained. There is a lot of magnificent work done in the "Mills of the Gods," there is taste and in intelligence shown in every department of production, and it is on this very account that I would like to see such stories in action have a higher perspective of what is reasonably sure to engross common interest so far as the motive is concerned.

Scene from "The Mills of the Gods" (Vitagraph).

Maria is a tavern waitress when she attracts the caprice of Lorenzo—he is even then a man of power and influence in Milan. He notices her in the street, follows her to the inn and tries a boorish form of making overtures to the girl when she serves him with liquor. She slaps him real hard and he goes out in a boiling rage, swearing vengeance. Among those who defend her is Miguel, a young workman, and his flavorless friend, Pietro. We next see Maria as the wife of Miguel, and there is a child in evidence. A year must have passed, but powerful Lorenzo has been unable to accomplish anything very notable in the way of gratifying his vindictive feeling. No further reason exists why he should bother himself about the affair, but he initiates a series of persecutions which make it impossible for Miguel to obtain employment. Wherever he works he is discharged. He becomes impoverished, and is evicted when Lorenzo buys the hovel in which he lives.

He joins the revolutionists, does Miguel, and a troop of cavalry is introduced to quell the revolution. Miguel is arrested and carried off to prison. His wife dies in a hospital ward. Her sister Giulia—this is the role played by Rosemary Theby—appears at the death scene. Giulia is an actress and a dangerously attractive woman. She swears vengeance over the body of her sister. The husband—he has been released—also appears as a vengeful factor, but he is unaware that Giulia is his wife's sister. This ends the firt part.

Ten years after, Giulia, according to the subtitle, is awaiting a chance for vengeance and suffers Lorenzo's attentions. She engages a lawyer to watch Lorenzo, and she is thoroughly modern in hiring an attorney to destroy Lorenzo's accumulations, but the villain is the more active in perpetrating wicked deeds. As the active president of an insurance company he learns that the policies on Miguel's houses are about to expire and he commits a felony by destroying the usual warning notice. Next he disguises himself and sets out for a tavern where he comes upon Tano, a feeble-minded boy of criminal tendency, and plots to burn the uninsured buildings. A great fire scene follows, and a consequent loss of life. Tano sees the corpse of a woman brought from the flaming buildings and is driven insane by realization of his crime. He becomes the agent of that invisible influence which accomplishes the requital of evil and its punishment. Meanwhile, Giulia and her lawyer manage to ruin Lorenzo financially, but he is one of the most enterprising villains ever shown on the screen. He abducts Miguel's little child and puts her in the hands of some wandering Gypsies. A fruitless search follows and the second part ends with Lorenzo still occupied with revenge, seemingly indifferent to the elements working against him.

Scene from "The Mills of the Gods" (Vitagraph).

The action in the novel is apparently scattered over several localities, Milan and the Italian lakes being introduced for the author's purposes, but as no reason exists for scattering all the unities of the play, it could have been laid in Milan alone. It is now transferred to Turin. Beautiful Giulia—and she is beautiful—draws Lorenzo to Turin, while her attorney pursues his insidious methods in Milan. The action in the play now becomes more animated in the struggle between antagonistic individualities. The broadest and most elemental of human emotions are now pictured and we are made to feel that the energetic criminal's career is nearing its close.

Attention is now centered upon the destruction of the villain. He has accomplished a vast amount of injury and ought to suffer the consequences. He has persecuted the hero; he has caused the death of the woman who repelled his advances; he has committed felonies; he is guilty of arson; he has abducted an innocent little child, and he is still looking well, even better than could be expected. What will he his end? It almost appears that he is about to win the lovely Giulia, his capacity for evil seems so inexhaustible, but his time is coming. Destiny's instrument is the half-crazed boy, Tano, who set fire to Miguel's houses at the villain's instigation.

The lawyer secures possession of Lorenzo's property by means known only to the profession of sharp practices and deception, even confiscating his residence. It might have been interesting to the people who attend picture shows if some idea had been given of the methods employed by the attorney, but his class is not in high favor just now except with those who commercialize vice, and his enmity might awaken sympathy for the desperate villain.

The principal characters are brought together in an effective ensemble in his rooms and the tension is revealed when Giulia rejects the costly present he has purchased for her out of the ruins of his property.

Miguel attacks Lorenzo in a hand-to-hand fight which will make members of the audience sit up. It is the impulsive assault of a deeply injured man against one of power, and is a fierce conflict of early passions. Lorenzo escapes death, but he is forced to trace the abducted child. Again he escapes. He enters the inn where he plotted to burn Miguel's houses and draws the attention of insane Tano. Tano has become a monomaniac. His one desire is to burn. He leads Lorenzo away to have "a smoke" and locks him in an upper room after setting fire to the place.

Lorenzo pays the penalty of his crime at last, his death struggles are those of agony, and, I suppose this ends the play. It is time to ring down when the villain dies.

Aside from the admirable choice of types, this photodrama is remarkable for the accuracy, good taste and beauty of its settings. The quality of scene and acting is of the finest.

"MY WIFE'S AWAY—HURRAH !" (Eclair).

A character comedy that will delight the ladies particularly, because it shows how a shrewd wife made a monkey of her gay old husband who thought he was making a monkey of her. She completely exposes the bacchanalian revels of the sly old dog under their own roof as the "Johnnies" and chorus girls scamper away in retreat.

He is a stingy old cuss; so stingy, in fact, that he refuses to pay a C. O. D. of $4.50 on some dress goods ordered by his wife. She decides that this action is about the limit and promptly packs her duds, and leaves to live with her married daughter. The old man is very much pleased with this state of affairs because it will give him a chance to hold a few little parties at his home, having as guests a number of his convivial friends of both genders. The wife and daughter, comparing notes, correctly surmise that the old man will need a servant during his wife's absence. They plan that mother shall disguise herself as a colored "mammy" and apply to father for the job. Mother gets the job and with it a fine opportunity to gather first-hand evidence against the old man.

The very first night he brings home an assorted bunch of inebriates from the club, who at once proceed to get in some rowdy work on the piano and do considerable damage to the bric-a-brac. The colored servant is supposed to be deaf and dumb, but she can write, all right. She has one pet sentence that she writes on a pad and hands to the old man whenever things begin to get warm. The sentence reads: "I'll tell your wife." Every time she hands him this, the stingy old thing hands over ten or twenty dollars to keep her quiet. By a constant system of blackmail, the wife gets many a ten-spot out of the man who refused to pay her C. O. D. of $4.50. In this way she has sweet revenge until she finally springs the trap.

The occasion is a brilliant soiree, tendered to a bevy of chorus ladies and "gentlemen friends," all warm members of the midnight crew. When the gaiety gets to its height the wife extracts another generous dividend from the old fraud and then throws off her disguise. The guests stand not on the order of their going, but they go very quickly. In their mad scramble to get away they even forget to say good-bye to their host, but he doesn't notice this breach of etiquette, as he is very much occupied at that particular moment trying to convince mother that her eyesight is defective, but it's no use; she has the goods on him and he is left to explain his generosity to his friends and his stinginess to his wife.

The Screen Club Is a Fact.

The First Social Organization in the Moving Picture Industry Appoints Committees.

"FREQUENTLY the Lambs give a Gambol, the Friars give a Frolic and the Greenroom Club gives a Rehearsal. I do not see why the Screen Club should not run a Reel."

So spoke John Bunny at the meeting of the Screen Club at Bryant Hall on Wednesday evening, the 12th inst. The meeting had been called to further the work of two previous gatherings, the first attended by seven, the second by fifteen. The third meeting brought to seventy-five the roll of those who had deposited $5 as an earnest of their intentions to join the club.

The inception of the organization was in a Broadway café on Labor Day. The basic idea was a club founded with the triple purpose of unity, advancement and preservation of the motion picture art, and composed of those allied in the development of the art. It was decided to have another get-together for a general consultation on the following Thursday. On the evening of that day these were present:

Dell Henderson, of the Biograph; Larry McGill, director of the Republic Film Company; Pierce Kingsley, director of the Republic Film Company; Frank Powell, C. A. ("Doc") Willat, of the Mutual Film Corporation; Herbert Brenon, director with the Imp Film Company; William E. Shay, of the Imp Film Company; King Baggot, of the Imp Film Company; William Lamp, of the Majestic Company; Frank Russell, of the Powers Company; H. C. Judson, of the Moving Picture World; G. F. Blaisdell, of the Moving Picture World; Thomas Malloy, of the Dramatic Mirror; F. J. Carroll, of the Cheyenne Motion Picture Company, and Calder Johnstone, of the Morning Telegraph.

King Baggot was chosen temporary chairman; Calder Johnstone, temporary secretary, and Frank Powell, temporary treasurer. As a tentative basis it was decided that those eligible should be managers, directors, actors, authors, cameramen and photoplay newspaper men. The meeting enthusiastically ratified the suggestion of Frank Powell that the name of the organization be the Screen Club. A committee of three was appointed to send out invitations to as many as could be reached before the next meeting. The temporary chairman also appointed a committee to draft a constitution and by-laws.

Calder Johnstone called the meeting to order Wednesday evening and briefly outlined what had so far been done.

As King Baggot took the chair, William Shea, of the Vitagraph, moved a rising vote of thanks to Mr. Baggot for initiating the Screen Club. The vote was given, with applause. Mr. Baggot called for remarks from Charles Kent, Harry Raver, John Bunny, Maurice Costello and Herbert Prior. A recess was declared in order that those present who so desired might visit the treasurer. The following subscribed their names on the roll:

I. Bernstein, A. H. Saunders, L. M. Rubinstein, Harry Raver, William Steiner, J. H. Macdonald, Lee Beggs, J. P. Read, Jr., W. F. Haddock, Oscar Apfel, F. E. Holladay, J. F. Goodwin, Herbert Prior, Henry Cronjager, Carl L. Gregory, A. W. Hall, Darwin Karr, E. W. Sargent, Carl L. Johnstone, Harry Benham, David Thompson, Walter Edwin, Alfred Paget, H. Z. Levine, Harry Harvey, Harry Speer, John Bunny, Hal Wilson, George J. Elmore, Richard Spencer, William Garwood, John Charles, Hugh Hoffman, Jack Dillon, B. C. Foy, James Kirkwood, F. J. Beecroft, W. J. Welsh, W. F. Russell, Paul Scardon, M. J. MacQuarrie, A. Warner, Bert Adler, A. A. Cadwell, Charles Eldridge, E. M. Roskam, James Carroll, George Cooper, Edward Dillon, E. J. Le Saint, J. W. Morrison, Jack Cohn, Henry Walthall, Owen Moore, Maurice Costello, A. V. Smith, William Shea, Tefft Johnson, Van Dyke Brooke, Charles Kent, Hector Dion.

As will be seen, these names include many of the best-known motion picture men centered in and about New York City. It is probable that steps will very shortly be taken looking to the engagement of permanent quarters, possibly at the meeting on Saturday evening. Everyone present on Wednesday evening was of one mind as to the necessity for a fraternal, social organization in the industry. There was not a dissenting voice on that. The question uppermost was as to the best and most effective means to establish it.

The chair appointed a committee on constitution and by-laws, which will probably report on Saturday evening, as follows: Messrs. McGill, Smith, Saunders, Daly, Apfel and Johnstone. On membership he appointed Messrs. Bunny, Henderson, Willet and Brenon.

Calder Johnstone in his opening remarks suggested that the committee on constitution and by-laws might consider the feasibility of establishing a branch of the Screen Club in Los Angeles, working under a charter of the New York organization, yet having their own officers. Mr. Johnstone called attention to the fact that there are ten companies working there.

Charles Kent expressed his approval of the general idea of a club for motion picture people.

Harry Raver said that he could hardly realize that such rapid progress had been made with this real worthy organization. "I have often thought," Mr. Raver continued, "that the moving picture business had reached the point where the interests of the men responsible for the success of the industry would be advanced and strengthened if we could get together on some common ground and form some sort of an organization that would help uplift the business. We are all working too much at cross purposes. We are allowing a great deal of professional jealousy to creep in on account of factions and political strife. A club of this kind will eliminate a great deal of this feeling and be instrumental in improving the business generally. I promise you all the personal help I can give."

Mr. Bunny took a prominent part in the deliberations of the meeting and proved to be as popular with his fellow-players as he is with the picturegoing public. By his intimate knowledge of parliamentary procedure and even more by his tact and quiet humor he straightened out several troublesome problems. That he will be a power in the new organization, and a power for the organization, was demonstrated Wednesday night. He was given a most cordial reception when Chairman Baggot called on him for a few words.

"It seems to me," said Mr. Bunny, "that the motion picture industry has arrived at that stage now where there is no possible question of its future. We are agreed the industry is here, and here to stay." Mr. Bunny then referred to the many theatrical social organizations, and brought a laugh when he made the sally quoted at the beginning of this story. He spoke of the advantages of social intercourse, adding that it is the "attrition and constant rubbing that makes for smoothness. I am not much of a man for talking," continued the popular comedian. "I prefer to keep silent, at least, in my business. It took me twenty-six years to find that out. [Laughter.] I wish the Screen Club all the luck in the world. I pledge my time, my services and my money for its success."

LUBIN TO MAKE BIG INVESTMENT AT "BETZWOOD."

Plans are being formulated without delay for the investment of a sum of money, which will reach a total of $1,000,000, in the improvement and alteration of "Betzwood," the magnificent country estate of the late John F. Betz, on the Schuylkill River near Philadelphia, which was recently purchased by Mr. Siegmund Lubin, president of the Lubin Mfg. Company. It has been decided to turn the great estate into a moving picture colony, and accommodations will be prepared in the very near future for 600 employees of the various departments of the picture-making business, which will soon begin operations on the estate. One of the latest ideas of Mr. Lubin is to establish a plant for the manufacture of celluloid raw stock. The nature of the land 'round about "Betzwood" is rugged in many places and it is expected that a good many of the Lubin Western dramas will be enacted upon these grounds. Plans for a laboratory are now being considered and the chances are that a large studio for winter work will be erected, and it may even come to pass that the present Philadelphia studio used by the Lubin Company will be abandoned in favor of the new one, which may be erected in some corner of the big estate.

THEATER CHANGES HANDS.

Mr. R. E. Gumm, formerly connected with the United Theater Company of Chicago, has purchased the Majestic Theater, at 24 East Superior Street, Duluth, Minn. Mr. Gumm will change the name of the theater to the "Diamond," and will run it as a high-class motion picture theater, charging five cents admission, excepting Satudays, Sundays and holidays, when ten cents will be charged.

REQUEST FOR LISTS AND CATALOGUES.

Thos. E. Smith, Inspector of Places of Public Entertainment, Chief Secretary's office, Adelaide, So. Australia, would like to receive manufacturers' lists of film releases and catalogues of projection machines and other theater equipment.

"In the Land of the Lions"

The Gaumont Company Releases Another Big Two-Reel Special.

IN a recent interview, printed in the New York Times, Mr. A. H. Woods maker of thrilling melodramas, said that if certain melodramatic elements were given to him, he could with them very surely change the "spine tingle" of American audiences into dollars. The elements he referred to were such incidents as the rescue or escape of the melodrama's heroine from one flying automobile to another, or from the fast rushing locomotive.

He was right in saying this. We like to have our feelings thrilled as we like to know that we are alive. If our hearts jump up into our throats for an instant, so much the better. If the big thrill of this kind is accompanied by the longer-lasting thrill, as when our feelings are grasped and wrung by a situation, we are willing to pay not only once, but several times and to see it again and again. So the dollars come.

But on the stage these thrills are only illusions. They have to be mechanically very perfect or modern audiences will see through the trick and some of the effect will be lost. Even in the best melodramas we never truly feel that our friend the heroine or her rescuer are in any danger. But when a motion picture maker takes an incident of this kind in hand he finds it much easier to hide the mechanical means by which the eye is deceived. Indeed, we have seen motion pictures where the means were so hidden that the incident wrung a cry from the spectators. The producer can even do without any deceiving or illusion, if his players are brave enough and are willing to run some risk. In such a case he shows the real thing; the spectators merely do not see the safety devices that protect the players and are for use only if something goes wrong.

The newest Gaumont special feature release in two reels is a melodrama photographed in Africa and is called "In the Land of the Lions." As a spine tingler, we do not believe it can be beaten. The lions that are used are not tame; they are plainly very ferocious. The action works up to a climax where the only way out is the death of the lion. The big brute has chased a settler's family into the house and has then cornered a man and two women in a room. He is so big that as he ramps up against the closed door, he covers it. A native boy hands to the settler, through the window, an automatic big caliber revolver and the man, opening the door a crack, shoots the beast dead. The picture is hand colored, very clearly photographed, and has interesting backgrounds.

In the opening scene, we are shown the lion with his mate at the mouth of their cave in the rocky hills. They are irritable and are snarling. (A good growler sound effect will be of great use; the picture needs it.) Suddenly, the tigress turns toward the camera and springs. It is wholly unexpected and quick as the snap of electric fire. The spring is right toward the audience and there is no anti-climax, for the film ends with the beast in the air. It brings the heart right up to the throat.

The next scene shows us the two lions coming down for their meat. The male appears through the palms of Jean Moreno's ranch, leaps the high fence and disappears into the stable courtyard, scattering the sheep. In the morning, a dead lamb is found by the settler's man. A trap is begun that is to capture the lion; but in the meantime a neighbor sends to Moreno demanding payment of a just debt and threatening to "take other steps" if the money is not forthcoming at once. No pleading will make him relent.

To Moreno's wife, the making of the lion pit suggests a means of vengeance on the hard neighbor. She persuades her husband to make the trap so that the lion will be captured alive. This is done. We see how such a trap is made and see the lion fall into it. The beast is then caged and at evening carted to the ranch of the neighbor, where it is turned loose. The family are shown enjoying supper in the twilight near their door. It was really essential to have these good people near the door; for the lion quickly appears. They were not any too near that door as it was, and there was no unconvincing turning back and no unnecessary gestures in their getting into it. Neither did his lionship hesitate in the chase. He came so fast that he nearly got his prey, but his impetus carried him, since his path was across the door, past it. This gave the people a chance to get into the second room and to get that door closed before Leo got his feet disentangled and a good aim for a second spring. The killing of the beast and the arrest of the wrongdoers follow. The ending scene shows the lioness waiting for her dead lord at her cave.

It is true that the picture's story, while effective, is not so strong as its thrilling power. Its only fault is that it has no hero or heroine in the real sense of the word. Yet as a release and as a means of giving the thrill that audiences are glad to pay dollars for, it is a big success. It will create a thrill in most towns where it is shown. Such a picture ought to have more than one night's run. There ought to be a chance for those who are fortunate enough to see it to tell their friends about it. It is the kind of picture that will advertise itself.

CARL LAEMMLE WELCOMED.

When Carl Laemmle stepped from the Olympic on Thursday, September 5, he was greeted by a delegation from the Imp studio and factory. The sentiment of co-operation and good-fellowship which has always marked the progress of the Imp was most beautifully evidenced by a floral tribute given by the various employees of the Imp studio and factory.

When Carl Laemmle walked into the reception room of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. a smile spread over his face as he gazed upon the monster floral horseshoe which stood upon the table. For many years Carl Laemmle has closely knitted the ties between his employees and himself and there is no man who stands higher in the estimation of the men under him than this genius and general of the film industry.

A brief message of good will and wishes for prosperity was attached. Mr. Laemmle was also guest of honor at a dinner given by his business associates Saturday evening, September 7.

ESSSANAY COMPLETES "ROBERT OF SICILY."

The Essanay Company announces they have completed the massive three-reel production of "Robert of Sicily," a dramatization of Longfellow's wonderful poem. Essanay's adaptation promises to be unquestionably a masterpiece, surpassing anything of American manufacture in point of production, stupendous scenic settings and novelty.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

FIRST CONVENTION OF THE M. P. E. L. OF MINNESOTA.

Held in the St. Paul Hotel, St. Paul, on September 4 and 5.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

I AM indebted to C. M. Christenson, national secretary of the M. P. E. L. of America, who called at The World office Saturday, September 7, on his return home from the Minnesota convention, for the following official account of the proceedings of that meeting.

The convention opened Wednesday morning at 11 o'clock, Otto N. Raths acting as temporary chairman. About 100 exhibitors from all parts of the State and also from adjoining States were present.

The chairman introduced Thos. R. Kane, president of the Common Council of St. Paul, Mr. Kane acting as spokesman for Mayor Herbert P. Keller, who was unable to be present on account of a previous engagement with the Game and Fish Commission. Mr. Kane welcomed the visitors to St. Paul and spoke of the motion picture theater as a great asset to the many industries of the State.

Governor Eberhart, of Minnesota, was next introduced. There was great enthusiasm when he appeared, and it was several minutes before he could be heard. He spoke at great length of the possibilities of the motion picture. He said he was a regular patron of the picture theater, and was always pleased with the educational subjects and received great enjoyment from the dramas and comic pictures. He urged the small towns in Minnesota to encourage the moving picture theater. He said it would be the means of keeping the boys and girls on the farms and in the small towns, instead of coming to the large cities, if they could have advantages of education such as the moving picture offers.

William J. Sweeney, vice president of the M. P. E. L. of America, was next introduced. He told the exhibitors of the great good that would be derived from an organization of this kind in Minnesota, and enumerated the good results obtained in Chicago and all over the State of Illinois by it. He referred to the national convention held in Chicago last month, where almost every State in the Union was represented, and to the great number of visitors from all corners of the United States, and to the high character of the men and women at that convention. He said it convinced him more than ever before that the motion picture theater was here to stay and that its foundation was as solid as the rock of Gibraltar.

National Secretary Talks on Censorship.

C. M. Christenson, national secretary, of Cleveland, was the next speaker. Mr. Christenson talked at length on the censor board proposition. He said that one National Censor Board, such as they have in New York City, composed of fifty odd members, including ministers, society women and business men, should afford sufficient judgment as to whether pictures are good or bad. After receiving such approval, it should be sufficient proof of the moral, educational and comic values of the pictures, and there should be no further questioning on the part of any city or municipality in the United States.

Mr. Christenson related the history of the M. P. T. L. of America, since it started with eleven members, two years ago, in Ohio, until to-day, when there are over 6,000 members, and the organization growing every day. He spoke of the different conditions in film rentals that existed in various parts of the United States, under which exhibitors were charged $75 a day in one section of the country, and $15 a day in another, for the same film, exhibited on the same day. He stated that the organization had been instrumental in helping state and city authorities in correcting evils that existed in the shape of building codes and city ordinances, and emphasized that to-day, in Eastern States, exhibitors are 100 per cent. better off in the way of regulations than they were a little over a year ago.

"We have established an insurance branch of the league for our members, covering both fire and casualty insurance, at about 40 per cent. less than we have been paying," continued Mr. Christenson, "and it also covers our films and machines, which no other insurance company has done. The underwriters of this country were bent on charging us exorbitant rates on our insurance, not alone on our chattel property, but by increasing the rate of insurance on the entire building and on all other business in such buildings where our theaters were located. I hope our members will take advantage of this insurance plan, thus assuring our national officers, who have worked long and hard, that their efforts have been appreciated."

Capt. Pulis Shows Value of Motion Pictures to U. S. Army.

Captain C. C. Pulis, 2d United States Artillery instructor, of Minnesota, was next introduced. Mr. Pulis said he was a lover of the motion picture, and that he had realized for a long time the greater possibilities in store for the young man of to-day in the way of education.

"It is possible for a young man to be taught the lessons of military life in less than 30 minutes by the moving picture, where in the past it has taken days and weeks of actual experience," said Captain Pulis. "In fact, we have experienced a great deal of trouble to get young men to enlist in the army, on account of their having the wrong impressions of army life. By motion pictures we can show the young man the actual and beneficial training given in the army; the result is that we are not having that hesitancy on the part of young men to join our army, which formerly prevailed, and this has all been accomplished in a short space of time by the projection of army life on the film."

Mr. Preller, manager of the Minneapolis branch of the General Film Company, next addressed the convention. He assured the exhibitors that he was always willing and glad to meet the grievance committee of the Exhibitors' League, and to do all within his power to adjust matters that were reasonable. He also assured the members that the General Film Company was in hearty accord with the exhibitors' movement in organizing.

Mrs. M. E. Brinkman, of Bemidji, Minnesota, was a very enthusiastic speaker. She said she had been able to get enough information to save all the expenses of her trip.

Resolution Advocating Censorship of Special Films Not Handled by Regular Exchanges.

A resolution was then passed, thanking the motion picture trade journals of the country for the loyalty and support given the league. This was followed by a resolution endorsing the league insurance plan. A resolution was then offered J. F. Cubberley, a traveling exhibitor, to the effect that a board of censorship should be appointed by the president to pass on all special films offered by others than regular film exchanges; and that no member of the league should contract for any such film or films unless the approval of such board was obtained; also that a card should be issued by the league giving the titles of accepted pictures, the number of reels in each, and the names of the owners. This was carried unanimously.

The convention then adjourned, the next meeting being fixed for June, 1913, the date to be decided later.

Minnesota League Officers and Committees.

The following officers were elected at the convention: President, Otto N. Raths, St. Paul; vice president, Thomas Furniss, Duluth; secretary, E. F. Purdee, Minneapolis; treasurer, H. A. Sherman, Minneapolis; sergeant-at-arms, C. F. Rose, St. Paul; national vice president, George Osborn, St. Paul.

John Wentworth, Spring Valley; D. A. Robbins, Winona; C. E. Guthman, St. Cloud; John Christopherson, Benson, and George Osborn, St. Paul, were appointed as members of the executive committee.

The following ladies were appointed to serve on the ladies' entertainment committee: Mrs. H. S. Mitchell, Mrs. James Gilowski, Mrs. C. F. Rose, Mrs. Geo. W. Dayton, Mrs. Davis, and Mrs Otto N. Raths.

Congratulatory Telegrams Received by President Raths.

The national president, M. A. Neff, was not present at the convention, as is explained by the following telegram to Otto N. Raths: "I regret that I am forced to be absent from your convention. I am looking West to-day and thinking of the exhibitors of Minnesota. I hope, nay, I am sure, that your convention will be successful and harmonious. Personal regards. Best wishes to every member of the Minnesota league."

Mr. Raths also received the following telegram from Carl Laemmle, New York: "Regret exceedingly inability to be with you. Am returning from Europe bubbling over with enthusiasm about the Universal program, and the progress that you and the rest of your exhibitors have made during the past year. Nothing would please me more than to see this organization the strongest in the world, and in a position to demand their rights and get them. I have always been heartily interested in every one of your projects, and I cannot express too sincerely my best wishes for your accomplishing the many good things you have set out to do. Good luck and best wishes."

Telegrams conveying congratulations and good wishes were also received from David Horsley, treasurer of the Universal Film Mfg. Co., of New York; H. B. Coles, of the Nicholas Power Co., New York, and L. A. Woodward, of the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., Chicago.

Business Firms Represented.

The following firms had displays: Nicholas Power Co., represented by Mr. Swett; Precision Machine Co., by Mr. Robin; Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., Western Display Co., represented by W. A. Wilwerscheid; Geo. H. Webster Booking Exchange, by Geo. H. Webster; St. Paul Feature Film Co., represented by Sam R. Thompson; Warner Feature Co., of Minneapolis; Universal Film Mfg. Co., represented by James V. Bryson and Miss Marian Furst; Mutual Film Corporation, represented by Mr. Jeudell; and the General Film Co., by Mr. Preller.

Convention Brevities.

I am under obligations to James V. Bryson, manager of the Laemmle Exchange, Minneapolis, for the following brevities and the telegrams already previously quoted:

Most of the credit for the arrangement of the convention meeting and for his tireless efforts in making it a great success is due Otto N. Raths. Mr. Raths is part owner of the Gaiety Theater, St. Paul, the most successful 10 cent picture and vaudeville theater in the Twin Cities.

Thomas Furniss, vice president of the Minnesota organization, is the pioneer exhibitor, and one of the most successful of the Northwest. Mr. Furniss is an extensive property owner and owns the largest picture theaters in Duluth at the present time.

Miss Marian Furst, one of the representatives of the Laemmle exchange, looked charming in her decorations of pennants and badges. She captivated the entire delegation with her winning smiles of welcome.

Visiting exhibitors appreciated highly the presentations of the "Massacre of the Sante Fe Trail" (101 Ranch Bison), "Human Hearts" (Imp), and other Independent subjects.

Otto English, of New Ulm, Minn., is not afraid to acknowledge that he was an operator less than two years ago. To-day he is manager and proprietor of one of the largest theaters in the State.

The venerable Col. A. D. Robbins, Winona, was a conspicuous figure at the convention.

Jake Barnet, pioneer of the Twin Cities' Amusement Enterprises, took a hearty interest in the proceedings.

Major Dayton, one of the St. Paul's financiers, who has just entered the motion picture business, is cleaning up a little more than anybody else on Wabasha Avenue.

C. T. Smithers, Aberdeen, S. Dak., showed that he enjoyed the convention thoroughly.

S. L. Rothapfel, of the Lyric, Minneapolis, the man who has shown us all how to do it, came over and looked on. Visiting exhibitors were invited by him to attend the Lyric on Friday evening. His presentations were hugely enjoyed by all who attended.

NOTICE TO PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS.

Fred. J. Herrington, National Vice-President for Pennsylvania, has sent out a notice to exhibitors of the state of Pennsylvania calling attention to the approaching meeting of the officers of the Pennsylvania State League at Harrisburg, Pa., for the purpose of planning a campaign of organization of the exhibitors of that state.: It is desired that all Pennsylvania exhibitors send their names and addresses to the proper officials at once so that arrangements to put an organizer in the field may be made at that meeting. Replies may be sent to Mr. Herrington, 233 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

NEW YORK STATE EXHIBITORS BUSY.

On Thursday, September 5th, a meeting of the executive board of the New York State Exhibitors' League was held at Albany, N. Y. All members were present and a profitable meeting was the result. A canvass of the membership of the State organization revealed a total of 600 theater managers in good standing.

Arrangements were made on this occasion for a meeting at Saratoga, N. Y., for the purpose of organizing the exhibitors of that city as a branch of the Albany local. This meeting will be held on Sunday, September 15, under the direction of President George Wright, of the Albany local. State President Trigger, National Vice-President Ascher and others will address the exhibitors on matters pertaining to the convention of the National League at New York in 1913. A banquet will be given after the business meeting. It is also expected that members of the company of Vitagraph players now working in the vicinity of Saratoga will be present and help in the program of entertainment. A good time is assured all who attend.

WILL BE BIG MEETING AT DALLAS.

An official call for a state convention to be held in Dallas, Texas, on the 15th and 16th of October, at the Chamber of Commerce Hall, has been issued by the National President. There will be big doings, automobile rides, sight seeing, banquet, all of the visiting ladies will be entertained by the ladies' committee on entertainment. The film companies of Dallas are going to demonstrate their friendship and good will by taking off their coats and working to make the convention a grand success. Every exhibitor in the State of Texas is not only invited to attend this convention, but is urged to do so, as matters vitally affecting his business will be discussed.

The first day will be more of a social gathering. At 10:30 the convention will be called to order at the Chamber of Commerce Hall, by the National President, M. A. Neff; an address of welcome by the Mayor of Dallas, a speech by the President of the Chamber of Commerce, and a response by M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; appointment of committees and adjournment to see the beautiful city of Dallas. This convention will bear out the traditional hospitality of the grand old commonwealth of Texas.

Exhibitors who are not in Dallas on the 15th and 16th of October will be like those who did not attend the Chicago Convention—sorry that they did not go. This will be one of the grandest state conventions that any state has heretofore held. Mr. Anthony Xydias, who has been appointed National Vice-President for the State of Texas, is working hard with every exhibitor to make the Dallas Convention an epoch in the history of the State of Texas. The State Fair will be on the 15th and 16th of October and there will be big doings in Dallas.

"Peril of the Plains" (Warner's Features).

Reviewed by G. F. Blaisdell.

IN his first feature production Mr. Warner may be pardoned for taking pride. When reference is here made to "first production," allusion is had, of course, to the first spectacle staged under Mr. Warner's authorization and following the general plan outlined by him. He has had other features, as is well known; successful ones, too. These were, however, the finished product of others' creation, the rights of which were secured by Mr. Warner, his selections being governed by his intimate knowledge of the demands of the moving picture public. This intimacy with the productions that appeal to the average follower of the screen is the natural result of close study and observation of human nature. Mr. Warner plans to cater not to Americans alone. His intention is to send his pictures to the four corners of the earth. He recognizes that in pictures there is one language—the language of the human heart. The unlettered descendant of the forest, now the reservation-guarded ward of a wise if not benevolent paternal guardian, will stroll into his nearest town and sit enthralled under the unfolding of a tale of love staged in surroundings of castellated walls or Italian gardens. The man of education and of natural refinement, possessed of a goodly share of world treasure, and accustomed to luxurious surroundings, will follow with closest attention the efforts of two clotheless, stalwart redmen to induce a diminutive, dark-skinned maiden to share with them a blanket and a tent.

With the object of equipping himself the better to cater to the lovers of motion pictures, it is Mr. Warner's intention shortly to erect in New York City a studio for the manufacture of big pictures. It is Mr. Warner's determination to avoid haste in the making of his features. A full month will be devoted to each. By pursuing this policy it is Mr. Warner's belief that he will build surely, that he will have sufficient time to correct any of the inadvertent oversights that will sometimes creep into a film—which unaltered stand out as does the flaw in an otherwise perfect stone—and that every multiple-reel story will be a compelling one.

"The Peril of the Plains" is a plain tale. It is a story of the sufferings of early settlers in the mid-West. If there are no views of great mountains there are charming scenes of level country, of shaded roads, rough, to be sure, in keeping with the period portrayed. There are sunlit, grass-covered lanes and great groves. No mansions adorn this story. Indeed, it must be confessed there is no place for them—as a matter of truth they would not adorn; they would be incongruous.

Of the many characters employed in the making of this drama, several loom large. Paradoxically, the largest is smallest. Little Helen, known to stage people in the Western country as the "blue ribbon rider of the West." will, as Rose, the child of the settlers, hold the sharp attention of children, of women and of men—and the admiration also. She is a fearless rider, and her exhibition partakes all the more of the character of horsemanship because her riding is done in a primitive country. The work of Eliza, the mother, makes strong demands on the emotional qualities of Miss Dot Farley. To her experience, both on the stage and on the screen, may be ascribed much of the dramatic quality of the picture. The portrayal of Jim, the settler, is well done.

On the spectacular side there is one feature which is unusual even in pretentious productions. This is the burning of a large cabin. The structure was not one of those hastily thrown together for the purpose of being destroyed. It had served as a human habitation for many years. During the conflagration there was a pathetic scene off at one side that was not recorded in the film. It was that of the old husband and wife who during their many married years had known no home but this log-walled, brick-chimneyed relic of early days. It was a spot hallowed by the innumerable memories that inevitably cluster around a long life. For the structure they had received a sum that would go a long way in the purchase of a modern home. That fact did in no measure, however, check the flow of the tears down their faces. To them it all meant simply the destruction of the only home they had ever known to make a moving picture holiday. But this is a digression. It is not in this story.

There are many strong situations in "Peril of the Plains." There are the prying up of the boards in the floor of the cabin by the husband, that he might find a hiding place for his wife when the Indians were attempting to batter down his door; his flight from the attic through the removal of the boarded skylight by the aid of a rope, with his little one tied in a bag the rope of which had been thrown over his shoulder; the terror of the wife when, huddled under the floor of the cabin, and following the slaying of one of the Indians by a companion in a squabble for the spirits jug, she discovered a drop of blood on her hand, believing it to be that of one of her loved ones; the battle of the father with one of the Indians after the escape from the roof and the binding of the wounds by his little daugher with strips torn from her skirt; the discovery of the wife under the floor by the Indians; the burning of the cabin by the savages, a most realistic picture, perfectly tinted, and showing the detailed disintegration of the structure, the falling of the chimney, and the absolute consumption of every bit of timber; the return of the husband to the scene, accompanied by his brother, and his attempts to enter the house in the belief that his wife was still under the floor; his later return and tender recovery of the bones of the Indian, believing them to be those of his wife; the captivity of the wife and the release of her bonds by the little Indian girl who had become so strongly attached to her, and the many rides of the daughter, the escape of the mother and the conflicts of soldiers and Indians.

"The Peril of the Plains" opens in a primitive log cabin set in a small clearing. It is a scene of unusual felicity. The father and mother are spending a happy, laughing hour going over old love letters. They are sitting by the doorway, their little daughter Rose playing close at hand. Back in the bush at the foot of the knoll on which the cabin stands several Indians are creeping. The mother glances up and sees them. She grabs her daughter and enters the house. The father throws down the great bolt which secures the only entrance. The father has to think quick, for the redmen already are pounding on the door. He takes a crowbar and pries up a couple of planks from the cabin floor and urges his wife into the retreat. She clings to her daughter. The father tears the child from her arms and closes down the boards. Then, taking Rose and his rifle in his arms, he lets down the ladder from the attic and goes to the floor above, pulling the ladder up after him.

The Indians break in and look around for the tenants.

Scenes from "Peril of the Plains" (Warner's Features).

Their search is interrupted by the discovery of the eatables and the jug of spirits. In an argument over the possession of the firewater, one of the Indians is stabbed and falls to the floor, across the planks covering the hiding place of Eliza. Upstairs, if a floor reached only by a removable ladder may be so denominated, Jim has been moving fast. He bundles Rose into a bag, securely tying the neck of the bag and throwing the rope about his neck. Then he fastens one end of a stout rope and throws the bulk of it through the open skylight in the slanting roof. He then lets himself and Rose gently to the ground, without discovery. Out in the field he encounters one of the band of redmen and a fierce hand-to-hand struggle follows. Jim is wounded, but he puts the Indian out. Rose binds his wounds. The two then set out for the home of Jim's brother, which they soon reach.

Meanwhile Eliza's torture under the floor has come to an end by reason of her discovery by the Indians. She has been unable to maintain the necessary quiet to conceal her presence. When the Indians find her they tie her and put her on the back of one of the two spare horses. To the house they apply the torch, and then they ride away. Eliza is taken to a large Indian camp. There are many women and children around the tents and in the street. Eliza is taken from her horse and falls to the ground. A little Indian girl greets her. She is then thrown into a tent.

James and his brother Andrew have lost no time in getting back to the home of the former. They find the cabin fiercely blazing and James is unable to get through the battered door. After the two brothers have left the home of Andrew, little Rose is determined to do her share of work—a man's share. She finds behind the cabin a horse ready saddled. She climbs onto the mount, and it is not an easy climb, either, but she swings around the corner of the house at full gallop, all of Andrew's family rushing to the door to learn the cause of the commotion. They are too late to stop the child. Away she rides, over rough roads and across fields, stopping at farmhouses, a veritable miniature Paul Revere, warning everyone to get to the fort.

Back in the Indian camp there is a war dance and council in progress. Eliza, helplessly bound in her tent, leans forward and carefully peers out. The significance of the sinister ceremonies is not lost upon her. The scene shifts occasionally back to the blazing home, which is now in ruins. One by one the great beams have fallen, the last side has dropped, and the brick chimney has gone the same way.

In the Indian camp a little girl has taken a strong liking to Eliza. On one of her visits, while the Indians were busy in their preparations, the little one has toddled into the tent and loosed the bonds that held Eliza's arms behind her back. Eliza now only awaited an opportunity to escape. It comes to her. She steals out and mounts a magnificent grey. As the great animal tears through the camp, two red men start in pursuit.

Right here the scenes shift with rapidity. James has visited the ruins and gathered the bones of the Indian for burial. He is still firm in the belief that his wife has perished, undiscovered by the redmen. On the neighboring farms the settlers are hurrying into their wagons on their way to the fort. Two Indians, disappointed in their pursuit of Eliza, who has eluded them by leaving the main trail and traveling over knoll and hollow, see the wagons and also Rose on her wild ride. The two hurry back to camp and arouse all the men in the tribe and they start out.

Rose has reached the fort. It is short work to get out the cavalry. They come tearing across country, Eliza riding with them on the beautiful grey, in order to guide them. It is all thrillingly done. Splendid photography enhances the views of fine landscapes. The harassed settlers at last have been forced to make a stand. The wagons are ranged in a circle. The crack of the rifles has stampeded the horses and they are running across country. The soldiers arrive none too soon. The marauders are beaten off. James, as may easily be imagined, experiences a shock when he sees Eliza riding in with the soldiers. Rose already is with him. There is a happy reunion all around. The settlers and the soldiers sing "The Star-Spangled Banner." The closing scene will surely make a strong appeal to Young America.

PICTURES STOLEN.

The Laemmle Film Service, of Minneapolis, Minn., reports that one of their customers, M. E. Cannon, of the Empire Theater, Chippewa Falls, Wis., has suffered the loss by theft of six reels of pictures. Mr. Cannon's theater was broken into on August 30. The subjects stolen are as follows: "The Mills of the Gods," "The Man from the West," "The Strength of the Weak," "The Tables Turned," "Pushmobile Race," "Eyes That See Not," "For Sale, a Life."

Any information which will lead to the return of the pictures and the conviction of the thief will be appreciated by the Laemmle Film Service.

The Photoplay Dinner

There Were Doings Down at Coney's Isle and Some of Them Are Here More or Less Truthfully Recorded.

THE photoplay dinner at Coney Island on Saturday evening went over without a hitch. It was a real time. While primarily it had been intended as a get-together of photoplaywrights, it later was decided to permit those less fortunately endowed to sit at the feet of the wise ones and pick up the grains of wisdom that bubbled over. Speaking of bubbling over—there warn't no such animal. Why, men came from Philadelphia—and, if there is any one combination more than another calculated to start something, it is that of a man from Philadelphia and Coney Island—but the Island was still in the same place on Sunday morning. And as nothing has been reported from Lubinville as missing, it is to be taken for granted that all got home.

The early arrivals were lined up for a peek by the Animated Weekly. It was too bad that Old Sol would not wait for the rest of the bunch, but he had to be on his way. You know it is said that down in Coney Island the old girl shines on the just, and leaves to her side partner, the man in the moon, the job of looking out for the rest of humanity; which would be a fine arrangement were it not for the careless habits of Old Luna in falling asleep at most unexpected times. The Weekly took a special squint at James Carroll, the first prize winner of the Powers Photoplay Contest.

Dinner was served at six o'clock. It was well after nine o'clock when the party rose from the table. The diners were arranged in T shape—that is, of course, the table was. Each one bore a tag which had been carefully printed by Epes Winthrop Sargent, and on it was inscribed some of the wearer's more notable achievements, if so be it happened there were any of these obstacles to record. Adjacent to the main table were several ladies who had accompanied members of the party.

Among those who sat down were Charles M. Seay, Edison director, who officiated as toastmaster, and his hearty lungs were most useful in making him heard over the hubbub of the adjoining Surf Avenue and the ordinary noises arising in a dining-room seating a thousand people. He was the right man for the job and was in thorough spirit with the occasion. Seated at Mr. Seay's right hand was Mr. Sargent, to whom credit for the success of the occasion was freely accorded. Others were Harry Harvey and Billy Quirk, of Solax, who on behalf of their company passed around bunches of roses; John Wylie, "Two Reel" Hall, B. P. Schulberg, Phil Lang, Harold M. Shaw, Mark M. Dintenfass, L. G. Coover, V. K. Whipple, E. Boudinot Stockton, Bushnell Dimond, A. Van Buren Powell, Edmund S. Hirsch, H. E. Levine, R. Ralston Reed, Morristown, N. J.; Herman E. L. Beyer, Newark; Harry E. Cittel, Philadelphia; James Carroll, George Hennessy, Charles M. Seay; J. M. Pittaro, Normandie by the Sea, N. J.; A. D. Hotaling, Philadelphia; Wallace C. Clifton, Hopp Hadley, C. B. Clapp, Geo. F. Blaisdell, J. L. Hoff, L. R. Harrison, C. B. Hoadley, Joe Roach, Edwin August, R. V. Spencer, Los Angeles, Cal.; Edward J. Montague, Willis L. Robards, Weehawken, N. J.; Benjamin Barondess, and H. O. Hoyt.

The ladies at the adjoining table included Miss E. J. Chalmers, Mrs. James L. Hoff, Mrs. Epes Winthrop Sargent, Miss Grace M. Lease, Mrs. Geo. Hall and Miss Sallie Potter.

After coffee had been served, Mr. Seay read a telegram from King Baggot, regretting a previous engagement prevented his attendance; and letters from James Dayton and Richard Willis, "screamario editors," Los Angeles, and Hal Reid, Stanley H. Twist, H. Tipton Speck and William Lord Wright.

Mr. Seay called for remarks from Messrs. Spencer, Stockton, Hennessy, Harrison, who responded by calling for a vote of thanks to Mr. Sargent (he got 'em); Lang, Cittel, Roach, Carroll, Quirk, August, Hotaling, Clapp, Dintenfass, Shaw, Wylie, Hoadley, Hadley, Hall, Schulenberg and others.

It was decided to elect a committee of three to arrange for a dinner to be held three months hence. Mr. Sargent at first declined to serve on the committee, pleading that he had had "some" work on the present occasion. He finally consented, however, to serve as chairman with a committee to be named, who were appointed by Mr. Seay accordingly. They were "Pop" Hoadley (Universal), Phil Lang (Kalem), and Harry Harvey (Solax).

Mr. Lang, scenario editor of Kalem, spoke briefly of the difficulties encountered by the scenario writers who were not in touch with the producers. He expressed the hope that a permanent organization would be the outgrowth of the gathering. Mr. Spencer, who occupies a similar position with the New York Motion Picture Company at Los Angeles, Cal., also expressed the hope that a permanent organization would result.

Dr. Stockton, speaking of the educational film, said it is the film of the future. He added that if he could be of any assistance in this direction to anyone present he would gladly give it. "Mr. Sargent will tell you I have the next best index to his own," he concluded.

John Wiley, business manager of the Moving Picture World, expressed the hope that one of the results of the meeting would be still better pictures for the public. He said that even though there were several groups in the industry the gathering furnished the best of evidence that all had been working with the same end in view. "I am sure," he added, "that you can count on the Moving Picture World being the friend of everybody."

Mr. Seay said he believed if a man has it in him he can write. "If he hasn't," he continued, "God himself can't help him. We believe up our way in helping a scenario writer who is a scenario writer. We want a heart story. Unfortunately many able men concoct a lot of words and call it a scenario. It is not. Scenario means more than putting words one after another. Scenario means story. The hardest thing on God's green earth is to write a story of 250 words—a one-act play is the hardest thing in dramatic literature to write.

"I was asked by Mr. Sargent to tell you about my first fifteen stories. I'll tell you. I didn't sell one of them! If you are going to write scenarios you have got to have sand—and lots of it. If you try fifteen times and find that a story doesn't land, then try fifteen times more, and if none of these land try fifteen more. If none of these connect, then quit."

Among the funmakers at the dinner the following took high rank. It will be found quite self-explanatory:

Hollywood, Los Angeles, Cal Aug. 29, 1912.

TO THE PRESIDENT, and the other Diners at the Photoplay Dinner, New York City.

GREETING: We, the undersigned, Screamario Editors of the Western Branch of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company (nothing like advertising!) trust that your dinner may be more satisfying than the average photoplay.

We write this from sorrowful experience, for we live on photoplays, we eat, sleep and drink 'em. We are never free from them. We dream them—good ones sometimes, but we can never remember those in the morning. (Curses!)

Our landlady suggests a good one every morning, our creditors suggest other good ones with a note of menace (we promise to bear them in mind, we do so until our bills are paid) people dart out of houses and hand us scenarios with a "You-know-me" air, as we go to our daily grind. The cowboys meet us at the gate with scenarios and remind us of small favors received; the actors present photoplays to us during the entire day. We digest 9463 scenarios per diem and return 9462 with insincere regrets.

We go visiting to escape the eternal scenario, and our hosts entertain us with stories they have seen on the screen and which we have seen twice already. They ALWAYS mention the good ones of other companies, and evince boredom when we start to tell them of the compelling story we wrote last week. They say, "Yes, that's not BAD"; and we wilt and wish we had not come.

Eat, drink and be merry, for on the morrow some of you will be viciously sending us new tales of "Indian-maidens-rescuing-handsome-White-gentlemen-from-raiding-tribes-and-thus-repaying-favors-received," and of "The-revengeful-ranch-foreman-setting-traps-for-the-fool-cowboy-who-obligingly-falls-in-and-out-of-'em-and-finally-marries-the-ranchman's-fair-daughter," and of "The-bad-half-breed-who-throws-his-guilty-guilt-upon-the-hero-and-confesses-when-mortally-injured," and of other nice original situations which delight our hearts daily. Gentlemen, DON'T DO IT.

We wish we were with you; we would like to meet you; several RYES under our weskits would make us love you (we know it, for we have done it before); we are with you in spirit (we almost wrote spirits), and we wish you joy, and

Humbly subscribe ourselves,
Screamarily Yours,

Here's to the December dinner! B.

HARDEE KIRKLAND JOINS SELIG STAFF.

One of the most recent and valuable additions to the Selig Polyscope Co.'s excellent group of producers is Mr. Hardee Kirkland. Mr. Kirkland, until recently, has been identified with David Belasco and his various productions. In the two years that he was with Mr. Belasco, Mr. Kirkland enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best stage managers in the business. Mr. Kirkland's first picture will soon be released under the title "The Voice of Warning."

"SUNDERED TIES" IS A BRONCHO.

In last week's issue of The Moving Picture World, in the extended review of feature subject "The Sundered Ties," that picture was credited to the "Bison-101" brand, when it should have been labeled "Broncho." The mistake was occasioned by our reviewer not being properly informed on the subject, there being no titles in the picture at the time it was shown to him. His natural conclusion was that it was a "Bison-101," and he so denominated it. This is not a bad recommendation, for "Bison-101" subjects have a high reputation and distinctive character. If "Bronchos" are always good enough to be mistaken for "Bison-101," there will be no serious complaint.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Probably Pays.

FROM Chico, Cal., the Majestic management sends a couple of copies of their house program. This is a four page sheet wire stitched into a heavy colored cover, the back and inside cover pages being given over to local tradesmen. There are twenty-one spaces and it is not unlikely that the program shows a profit in spite of the cost of the cover. It would appear that the covers are printed up in bulk and used as required for the week, which would materially reduce the cost. Black and red ink are used on various tints of paper and the booklet, in spite of the thinness of its contents, presents a better appearance than the program of some higher priced performances.

The bill is changed four times a week, giving a page to each change, and effective use is made of Cheltenham Inline for titles. We think that if the house would use but a line or two for each release and give the rest of the space to booming the house and the policy greater good would result. The use of a brief synopsis of the subject is a good idea only when other matter can also be used, for of the two, an announcement of titles with a descriptive line for each is better than the story that excludes the personal note. The constant aim of a management should be to get in touch with the patrons and hold them loyal to the house. The Majestic management had done so well what it has done that we would like to see them aim higher. An eight-page insert would be better yet, retaining the present form and adding four pages of argument and chat. Printer's copy can be prepared with the aid of a pair of shears and a copy of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, using chat of films and players and an occasional critique with some original matter pertaining to the house.

Keeping at It.

Easily the best advertising is that which does not appear to be advertising, and in this conection the Montgomery houses seem to lend. We are indebted to Mr. Montgomery for a copy of a circular widely distributed in Jacksonville by the Public Library and elsewhere. It announces a prize contest (with passes as the awards) for essays on subjects related to the legend of Rip Van Winkle. The circular explains this matter better than we can. It reads:

"RIP VAN WINKLE" PRIZE ESSAY CONTEST.

At the suggestion of the Public Library a Prize Essay Contest on "Rip Van Winkle" has been arranged.

1st Prize: A season pass good for two persons every Thursday at "The Grand."

2nd Prize: A season pass good for one person every Thursday at "The Grand."

Contest open to everyone. Essay to be of 1,000 words (about ten written pages). Contest closes September 10. Any one of the following topics may be chosen as the subject for your essay:

The Catskill Mountains and their Legends.
Great Actors who have Played Rip Van Winkle.
The Customs of the People in Rip's Village.
American History while Rip Van Winkle Slept.
Washington Irving and his Work.

At the Public Library may be consulted copies of "Rip Van Winkle," histories, biographies and other works on these subjects. These books will be reserved at the Library during the Contest, so that all contestants will have an equal chance to consult them.

Three well known business men will be the judges. Originality and interest will be the basis in judging the papers. Write on one side of the paper. Do not sign your name to the essay, but enclose it in a sealed envelope, writing your name in the corner of the envelope. The names of contestants will not be known to the judges. Hand essays to Grand Theater ticket office.

This is the entire advertisement. There is no mention of the fact that the reel is to be at the Grand Theater on a given date; there is no hint that there is such a reel as the Vitagraph special. It merely announces a contest in which the Public Library is interested. As a public spirited citizen Mr. Montgomery has offered the prizes and will receive the essays.

Hiding the Joker.

Even the newspaper notices, which mention the coming of the film, do not "play up" the theater in the notice, and it is precisely because the theater is not played up that the advertisement has the greatest value. This is not a boom scheme. It is to rouse interest in the Irving version of the legend, and it is because the theater is mentioned as a participant in the scheme that the mention has value. It gives the house the tacit endorsement of the municipality. It links the library, the librarian and the theater. It gives a quasi-official sanction to the picture show and it rouses the interest of many who may not now be interested in pictures and who could not be interested through the regular channels.

We have before this suggested the value of working in with the libraries in connection with the release of such films as are derived from the classics of literature, but this Montgomery scheme carries the idea much further than our suggestion. It makes the library an active participant in such a manner that the most active opponent of the motion pictures, and there still are some such, cannot make objection.

The Best of It.

But best of all this is a scheme that not only promotes the interest of the theater, but wakens interest in the library. It performs a public service in that it rouses an interest in good literature. Those who may find their way to the library in search of information will realize, perhaps for the first time, the advantage of the library. There are thousands of persons right here in New York who are afraid of the libraries. Probably there are proportionately as many in Jacksonville who never have been into the library before because they are afraid of red tape. With the incentive of a prize contest they will turn to the library for the loan of books and perhaps form a habit that will materially advance their education.

It will be seen that the statement is not made that this is a contest conducted by the library, but "at the suggestion of" the library.

With the producers turning more and more to the classics for ideas, with three-reel specials of some of the best of English literature, there is a wide field here for the alert advertiser. Watch for your chance.

Painted Signs.

Mr. Montgomery also sends a photograph of a painted sign, of which he has eight in Atlanta. As a general thing the painted stand is too expensive to yield a profit to the photoplay theater and it is only a management like the Montgomery that can afford to use this medium. It has a real value in the persistence of the appeal, but it does not pay the man with a small theater to use this form of advertising unless his appropriation for advertising covers the more general schemes and still leaves a surplus for this costly form of publicity. It is the Montgomery scheme to make the house more important than its bill, keeping the bill up to the house standard, and so the insistence of the name, and so this pays him where it would not pay many. The cut is offered more as a matter of interest than of general advice.

Booming Yourself.

Where it can be done it is better to boom yourself than the show. If you can get your name identified with an offering always worthy of that name it will mean more money in return than that spent on an attraction, but this means a longer, slower campaign, though there is always this advantage that the money you spend to-day to advertise yourself is as good next year, while the money you spend advertising an attraction in part passes with the passing of the attraction, no matter what the attraction itself has done to increase your credit. It is a nice problem and one that each management must decide for itself, but in planning your work try and make a part of the space go to boom you and your house and let the rest go to the offering you have to make.

Bernhardt in China.

From the Arcade Theater, Tientsin, comes some of the advertising used for recent attractions, the advertising being both in English and Chinese characters. It presents much the same appearance as the work here, though the prices range to 50 cents, probably "Mexican," which makes the actual admission half that price. A Bernhardt Camille poster is well displayed, the value of the lines being well indicated, a point overlooked too frequently in American work. Some simple rule work throws the arguments into relief.

A bigger bill is offered as a Sunday attraction, with Bernhardt and the Titanic Disaster for one admission, the prospective patron being advised that it is "Two Birds with one Stone," which is not altogether a happy line in view of the seriousness of the Titanic film. An allusion to double value would have been better.

A special four-page bulletin is gotten out for the Titanic reel, apparently the Sales Company reel. This was not put upon exhibition until August 3. A mortised frame for the first page enhances the appearance of the first page and two pages are given to description, the second page listing the scenes in detail.

An eight-page booklet is used for Redemption, the half tone cuts not showing up very well on the thin paper, but well enough to be plain and attract interest.

Augmenting the Bernhardt advertising is a gold edged card of announcement which is reproduced here.

ARCADE AMUSEMENT CO., TIENTSIN.

Dear Sir or Madam:

Have you ever in the past picked up a paper and noticed that the great and divine was to appear at such and such a theater at prices from 10 shillings to 20 shillings and laid down the paper with a sigh and a wish that you might see her? —— but such prices! And what a blessed place is China!

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT

But you can now have your wish gratified, for the management of the Arcade offers the great and only on Wednesday evening, July 31st, in three reels, 3,000 feet of motion pictures, for which appearance she received $100,000.

SARAH BERNHARDT
IN
ALEXANDER DUMAS' Great Emotional Play "CAMILLE"

As she has never appeared before at prices less than 10 shillings (or $5) and you have a chance to see her at the Arcade popular prices, do not miss this only chance.

Tientsin, 27th July, 1912.

In Manila.

We are indebted to Gus Heckler, who will be remembered by old amusement men as one of the early managing editors of the Dramatic News, for a copy of the Manila Daily Bulletin received from a Philippine friend interested in motion pictures.

The greater part of the front page is given over to photoplay news, including the announcement of the first showing of Kinemacolor by the Oriental Motion Picture Corporation. Automobile, court and financial news fill the rest of the sheet.

The Gaiety offers the Danites and the Lux Eastern Jealousy, the programs being made up of film from all sources. Programs are changed twice each week.

A comparison of samples gives a balance largely in favor of the Chinese work.

C for Cory Comfort.

W. A. Cory, recording secretary of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association, of California, and, with his brother, owner of the Cory Theater, San Francisco, writes that he has derived help from this department and sends a copy of their souvenir program used for the opening of the new house.

It is a four-page folder in brown ink on heavy white paper and aims to strike a keynote of comfort for the patron as well as a good performance. A catch line, "Just like home," starts the appeal on the first page and there is an emphatic to back up the suggestion. Managers everywhere are trying to live down the early and not always reputable days of the pictures both in print and the conduct of their houses, but we are inclined to think that the deed is better than the printed word. The better attitude is to ignore those days of damp, dark holes and let the public appreciate the difference. They will.

Finest Motion Picture
Theater in San Francisco,
Not a Nickelodeon.

Apart from this the program is excellent in every way and offers suggestion to others. We particularly like this line:

ABOUT THE HOUSE.

In building and furnishing the "CORY" the owners have bid for high class patronage, and consideration for the comfort and safety of patrons has decided every question arising.

The back page is given over to argument. The last paragraph is especially commended to the few managers who let their houses run themselves. No one is going to work as hard to win and hold patronage as you. Keep "on the job" yourself and do not delegate this duty to another. Make it your boast that you are always there and make good your boast. Here is the argument:

JUST WHY THE "CORY" IS THE BEST MOTION PICTURE HOUSE
IN SAN FRANCISCO.

BECAUSE the building is brick and as near fireproof as modern engineering can make it.

BECAUSE it has the latest concealed Fan Ventilating System.

BECAUSE the Opera Chairs are leather, roomy and comfortable. The Aisles are wide and have no steps. The Exits are large and numerous.

BECAUSE it has a curtain (Silver Screen) that eliminates eye strain.

BECAUSE it has the very latest improved machinery for the proper projection of Motion Pictures.

BECAUSE it has the concealed lighting system.

BECAUSE the decorations are pleasing and restful to the eye.

BECAUSE a steam heating plant has been installed for use when needed.

BECAUSE of the adequate and novel way in which the music accompanies each picture by the "MOTION PICTURE PLAYER" especially manufactured for us.

BECAUSE—Most Important, "C" stands for Comfort and Courtesy as well as Cory, and one of the owners will be on the floor at every performance personally looking after the Comfort and Courteous Treatment of the Cory patrons.

He Hustles.

As a rule, New York is almost too large to lend itself to small advertising, but in Brooklyn and the Bronx there are some hustlers and A. G. Wunderle, of the Pastime Theater, Brooklyn, is one of the hustlers. He decided to give a daily matinee and wanted the people to get to know about it quickly. He had some window cards printed, advertising Motion Pictures with "Telephonographical Lectures," and these he took around to nearby stores himself, explaining to the shopkeepers that the word would attract attention (It does, we would like to know what it is ourselves), and so draw the passerby to the window display. He also left a package of tickets with the same announcement and this coupon:

FREE THIS FREE
MATINEE COUPON

will admit one Adult during September, 2 P. M. to 5 P. M., except Saturday, Sunday and Holidays.

PASTIME THEATER
689 Knickerbocker Avenue
Bet. Jefferson Ave. & Cornelia St., Brooklyn

He not only secured a good display, but he planted matinee tickets all over the neighborhood in such a fashion that the recipients feel that they have been given something. This makes him solid with the stores as well and, everyone is happy, Mr. Wunderle most of all, because he is filling his house matinees and building a trade that will keep on after the distribution is stopped.

Booms in Advance.

He has a stencil cutting machine to make his slides with and while the reels are changing he announces the bill for the following day. He uses the names of players where possible, playing up the personality, and gets a better effect from the cutter than he could from written slides. We think he would get an even better result if he used black paper instead of yellow. If he can locate some place where kodak reels are developed the photographers will be glad to give him the paper that wraps the film. He can get quantities of this and obtain a clear white letter on black.

He also announces the next reel that the house may be cleared of those who have seen it, a simple thing that too many houses overlook. It is distressing to sit in a theater where the start of every reel is the signal for a rush that spoils the opening scenes and possibly loses the plot for the newcomer.

Perhaps Mr. Wunderle will tell us all what that Telephonographical lecture is. It sounds interesting.

Worked Up Well.

The Keystone Press sends a sample of a special handbill for Rube Marquard Wins in which judicious use of type brings up the relative values well. The title is the line that stands out most strongly and the use of bold type in a side box brings Miss Alice Joyce's name almost as large, though it does not intrude on the title. It might have been even better to have run her name as an underline to the title. The box is balanced on the other side of the cut by reference to the pitcher's new record of 19 wins. The date is thrown up well and a couple of trade marks help to balance the blackness of the cut.

In too much of the advertising that we see there is not maintained a proper balance in the use of type. A comparatively unimportant line may be thrown into almost startling relief through the use of a large bold type and kill the attraction of the title, the house and the date. Generally speaking, this should be the order in which the lines are played up. The title is the most important, because it is this that is to draw the business. The title being established, the place and the time have become important. Given these three, the catchlines may be played up, but the essential facts should not be made to take second place to some such a line as "Don't fail to see this great feature." One piece of Columbus advertising had the fact that the reels took three years to make in type six points higher than the title of the subject or any other line on the bill except a gigantic "to-morrow." A printer who knows his business will charge you no more for a good job. If you do not want to make a change educate your printer to your desires.

More from Mr. Midgley.

And speaking of Columbus, R. W. Midgley, of the Liberty Theater, Salt Lake City, reports on the second showing of Columbus. Here is his letter:

We noted with interest your comments in the last MOVING PICTURE WORLD on the pictorial paper and your opinion on the reason for the failure of the "Columbus" picture in the legitimate theater, and with this opinion we agree in part. The picture, when shown in the Liberty, drew much better than it did at the Colonial, but did not draw as well as the other special features we have shown, nor did it bring much more business than an ordinary program of pictures without any special feature. But, so much for "Christopher."

There was a reason I did not mention for not running it in the Liberty when it was first released. We noted that through increasing the price of admission to 25 cents for "Dante's Inferno," it took considerable time for some of the people to become convinced that the increase was just for the one engagement, and consequentiy the receipts suffered for some little time after. That was the principal reason for not running it in the Liberty, and then, too, the G. F. Co. wanted so much for it in addition to the regular service that we could not have made anything on it at 10 cents. Since then their terms have become a little more reasonable on features, so we are now able to run them at a profit at 10 cents.

We note what you say regarding the photograph exchange and sincerely hope that someone will take it up. Anything you can do to help it along will certainly be appreciated by us. We requested a photograph from ——— on "——— ——— ———," and they kindly sent it to-day. I will let you know later the results we get from it. We requested photographs from ——— on "———." They replied that they did not sell photographs and quoted us prices on half-tones, which were almost double what we could get them made here for.

We have started issuing programs again—a little larger this time, and I think a little better. We change twice a week, and issue 1,000 for each change. They cost us $12 a week and we use them for distribution to the houses, hotels and business places.

Educate Your Patrons.

We think that Mr. Midgley would do well to educate his patrons to an occasional raise in prices for features. The feature film is coming more and more to the fore; not features that would repay a special venture, but one that will cost more than the daily service and be worth more. On the screen, in the newspaper work and in program advertising begin a campaign of education. Explain that more must be charged because the feature costs more. Begin a week before the coming of the film and when the day arrives have a special price sign over the box office in which the statement is made that the raise is "For To-day Only." Put the same thing on the slides inside, and if the raise is not made too frequently there will be no back kick. A house that raises and lowers its prices like the profile plan of a roller coaster will not hold a steady patronage, but there is no reason why an occasional raise should not be made until the prevalence of the feature makes possible a permanent advance in admissions. The motion picture theaters will not always be ten cent houses. Start getting them used to it now.

Pictures.

We think that almost any manager will loan an occasional photograph, but we have eliminated the names in this letter in the first instance to save the obliging company from being flooded with similar requests, and in the second because we do not think the point well taken. It seems to us to be a short sighted policy on the part of a manufacturer to hold his cuts at a price that yields an excessive profit, but on the other hand the supplying of cuts involves a certain loss since the demand cannot be accurately gauged. Duplicates from an original usually cost half what the first costs, so that the cut is held at four times the actual cost, but to the cost must be added the postage, handling, packing and the cost of unsold cuts, so that this does not seem to be as excessive as appears at first glance.

The only practical suggestion thus far in relation to photographs comes from a "duplicator" who expresses a willingness to make reproductions from originals if we will hustle the photographs for him. What is wanted is a man who will go after the pictures himself and sell them for all releases. It is questionable if there would be an immediate sale for one thousand copies of each subject, and these prints can be made reasonably only when they are printed in quantities by machinery, though they are actual photographs. The matter is again referred to the duplicators.

The new program is one of the best printed we have seen, the fine screen half-tones coming out as well as good magazine work because good paper is used. Two issues are gotten out each week. It's a good job for $12.

Compact and Comprehensive.

The Orpheum Theater, Pocatello, Idaho, sends in a four-page folder giving three changes of program, the three being carried in two type pages 2¾ by 4¼. One departure is in the titling of each subject with the length in this fashion:

Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Aug. 22, 23, 24.
"DERBY DAY AT CHURCHILL-DOWNS."
The life of a Kentucky race horse.

"AN ARABIAN TRAGEDY."
An unusual headliner. Kalem picture, one reel.

"SHEEP SHEARING IN NEW MEXICO."
An interesting educational half reel.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS" No. 8.
An original michief-making comedy.
Selig picture. Half reel.

"THE WOOING OF WHITE FAWN."
Pathe picture An Indian drama. One reel.

For a lasting effect this is better than seeking to make six reels of four. R. D. Carrothers, the manager, makes very good use of his space by using small type, but on a good grade of paper the effect is better than larger type would give on poor paper. He gets the three programs in and still has room for N. E. Chaney's "Little Talk" about his theater, for which Mr. Carrothers conveys his thanks to the originator.

If you are helped by this department, send in your own original ideas that you may pay your debts to others.

"Lost Friend's" Note.

We have not heard from William Barie, Jr., in three weeks and rise to inquire if he has stopped doing things.

INQUIRIES

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of studio addresses, kept up-to-date, will be sent if a stamped and addressed return envelope accompanies the request.

CASHED IN—Comply with the rules or stay out, as you elect. You seem to forget that about the time you asked us Biograph questions you bragged to another question box that you knew all the Biograph names. Now are you wise?

G. A. P.—Use your own judgment on the "overworked idea," but we think that most companies apply this rightly to old ideas that will sell nowhere. If they ask for more, saying that they like your style, send them something else more original. Edison, Lubin, Vitagraph and several others now film the authors' names. Lubin has no Los Angeles studio at present and the matter seems to be up in the air.

D. K.—You are probably the forerunner of others, so here is the explanation in full. The Vitagraph's "Rip Van Winkle" was made by Mr. Charles Kent, who followed the Washington Irving legend, and not the stage version of the story. In the stage story, "Mine dawg Schneider" is often referred to, but is not given the same prominence in the book. Since it was the book, and not the play, that was followed, Mr. Kent did not make use of Jean, the Vitagraph dog, or any of her canine understudies. We think from a popular point of view, that it might have been done, since the play is more widely known than the book from which it was made.

H. M. L.—The fact that a player is no longer seen in the pictures does not always argue the death of that player. Mr. Wilder played a limited engagement with the Vitagraph and went back to his stage duties. He is one of the liveliest little corpses along the Boardwalk at Atlantic City. We do not believe that the Kalem-New Orleans company will be there this winter. Bison-101 and Bison-Universal are not the same. Take our word for it.

H. F. O.—The Biograph identifier is on the job again. Miss Dorothy Bernard is the sister of the "Goddess of Sagebrush Gulch." She also had the lead in "Heaven Avenges." The rich young man was Charles West. We do not know the "stout party" yet—but soon. In "The Spirit Awakened" the Renegade was Alfred Paget and the Christian Boy Ed. Dillon. Read any late issue of this department for some of the films Mack Sennet played in. He and Fred Mace were the detectives in the detective series.

B. I. T.—Miss Pauline Bush and Miss Jessalyn Van Trump were the girls in American's "The Pensioners."

K. S. B.—William Garwood was the son in Thanhouser's "Conductor 786." The other questions concern companies not supplying casts save the Lubin. In their "The Deputy's Peril," the Roger West was Edgar Jones.

M. Y.—Someone is betting on a sure thing. Mr. Anderson has been a part of the Essanay ever since its formation, and he most assuredly did not appear in a recent Biograph.

ELIA—A list has been sent you. Work from that, but you stand small chance, as the supply of players vastly exceeds the demand. Please note that the publication office is in New York and not Chicago.

L. M. C.—Miss Flo LaBadie was Sue in Thanhouser's "Whom God Hath Joined." She was very recently a Biograph player. Miss Marguerite Snow was the wife in the picture mentioned. Miss Clair McDowell was the wife in Biograph's "A Child's Remorse." See page 966, last issue, for Miss Bertham's death.

J. T. M.—Kalem's "The Hoodoo Hat" was made in Santa Monica, Calif. The Republic now has a western company. We do not know where the Atlas studio is.

AIM—Charles Eldridge was the Doctor in Vitagraph's "The Lovesick Maidens of Cuddletown."

HELEN D.—State names of characters when you seek an identity. A man "Who played with" Soandso is too indefinite. The name of the Vitagraph player is not given in the cast. This is done where the player is borrowed.

M. M.—See the last issue for the statement that Mr. Willis does not read scripts now. All photoplays for the Universal must go to 1 Union Square, whether intended for the eastern or western sections. Scripts for Bison-101 should go to Richard V. Spencer, at the address you give. It is not a component of the Universal. The title is being changed to Broncho and Keystone. See V. M. B. below.

H. M.—This question has already been replied to in this department, and has been taken up with the company in question. It seems to be in process of adjustment. Meanwhile, if you do not like their business methods do not send them scripts. That's the best plan.

H. B. K.—In Imp's "Tempted but True," King Baggot played John Prentiss.

W. A. G.—No companies have banners for sale. Any fireworks company will explain what smoke bombs are. Briefly they are fireworks the constituents of which give a dense smoke when exploded by a fuse. We believe that Miss Blanche Sweet is still with Biograph. We cannot state the name of the "latest" motion picture company to be formed. They come too fast and go too quickly to be kept track of. The legal dissolution of the Patents Company will not affect the business in the slightest. It is a nice legal technicality dealing purely with patent matters. We have no information that the Lubin company will make colored pictures in the near future. The announcement seems to have spread far and wide, but the Lubin people, who are most interested, have no knowledge of the matter. The Nestor company discontinued the Young Wild West series because it was found not to be in line with the present trend toward better standards of production. We can answer that Bison question better next week.

E. M. F.—The list has been sent you. With the exception of Gaumont, Thanhouser and Essanay any company is in the market for scripts. Just send them in with a return envelope. No advance letter is required. But the stories must not only be original. They must be better than the average run of stuff you see on the film. They must be as good as the best.

B. G. U.—There is no rule preventing the showing of Edisons and Biographs on the same program. We see it done every day. Robert Tabor was opposite Miss Ormi Hawley in Lubin's "The Deceivers." Miss Pates was still with Pathe the last we heard.

W. C. A.—Vitagraph's "A Cure for Pokeritis" was released February 23d of this year. We did not have the film story of "The Cardinal's Gift." Send a stamped envelope for the addresses you want, repeating your question.

M. B.—Mr. Richard V. Spencer will remain with the New York Motion Picture Company. Just at present he is in New York and was present at the Photoplay Dinner last Saturday. See below.

Stella M.—Nothing has "become" of Arthur Johnson. He is still in Philadelphia playing with the Lubin company. Just because you do not see him it does not follow that something has happened. Talk to your local manager. He can complain to the exchange.

J. McM.—In Lubin's "The Salted Mine" Neil Brown, the Easterner, was Burton King, the mine owner Richard Wangemann and Bud Fisher Romaine Fielding.

V. M. B.—Until the legal status of the Bison trade mark is established there will be more or less confusion as to the title. Richard V. Spencer advises us that all scripts sent the former Bison address are received by him and returned as promptly as they are read. Reading is somewhat slow since the litigation has entailed a mass of additional duties upon all the heads of departments, but two directors are at work on big dramatic subjects and two on comedy half reels. Material is in constant demand for all four directors. If the script that you speak of was sent in during the legal war it is not unlikely that it has been lost. There was more or less unavoidable confusion at that time and no doubt one or more scripts may have been mislaid. Mr. Spencer has cleared his desk of all those then in his possession either through payment or return. If your script is among the missing recopy and offer again.

Sure Thing, Anxious.

A correspondent signing "Anxious, Newark, N. J.," is hereby advised that any person who so desires may, upon purchasing the necessary admission ticket, attend the annual ball of the New York State Exhibitors' Association. This event will be held at Palm Garden on November 14, 1912.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Does It Pay?

LAST week we had a letter from a lady. We had several letters from as many ladies, in fact, but this particular lady put this proposition: She told us that she wrote hundreds of plots, but that she had not been making any use of them and she thought that they could be made into photoplays. She wanted to be assured that she would average at least $20 a week and wound up by saying that she hated to read her rejected scripts.

Personally we hate even the sight of a rejected script, but that's another matter. This inquirer wants to know if she can earn an income of at least $20 a week with photoplay scripts. It can be done, but we do not think that she can do it. We know a photoplaywright who makes close to $10,000 a year with photoplays and stories, and of this about seventy per cent. comes from photoplays. We know one man who averages $75 a week, and it is less than three years since we sent him his first check for $20. We know four or five who average $50 a week, and perhaps a dozen who make about $25. There is not a man in the lot who has not put in from three to four years of study. Bannister Merwin is hailed as an overnight star, but we turned a story back to him because he wanted a hundred dollars for it and we were afraid that the cashier had a weak heart, and that was just about three years ago. And even then he was one of the Munsey star writers.

Not one of the men (and a couple of the men are women, at that), fails to read over rejected scripts to find out the reason why, and he reads not with the proud consciousness that he could not do wrong, but with the knowledge that he had erred. Every acceptance was an encouragement, but every rejection was of greater value than the check that came with acceptance. The author gained only money from the check; from the rejection he gained knowledge.

That is why it is there are so few writers who command anything like a steady income from photoplay. The few have learned their business in the hard school of experience. They have studied their failures and their hits and they have found out why this story did not get over and how that story did. They have learned to write good picture plots and they have learned not to send out the poor ones until they are made good.

The person with a vivid imagination may be cursed by too prolific thought. They do not learn to weigh their ideas, they have no judgment; no exact standard of measurement. The trained writer knows what is good and what is bad. When the poor idea comes uppermost in his mind he thrusts it back and digs deeper for a good one. The man who systematically evolves plots, no matter what his method, may discard a dozen suggestions before he gets a satisfactory inspiration and it is precisely this ability to accept the good and discard, for the time being, the bad, that makes his work acceptable in the studio. His scripts are welcomed because they are of a reasonably good average. Consciously or not he gains the advantage of his reputation, but this reputation is based upon his work in the past. It is his only advantage over the man who has written a single story of the same grade. His only other asset is that he is known to be one who does not derive his plots from back numbers of the magazines.

It is perfectly possible to earn $20 and more weekly by writing photoplays, but it is not possible from the very start, nor will it ever be possible to the person who will not learn from experience and who does not like to read rejections.

In photoplay as in every other line of work there is no short cut to success. The rugged way must be traveled with such speed as the intelligence and industry of the novice permits, and those who have served the longest apprenticeship are those who seem not to have served at all; those who have grown up with the business.

Do not throw aside your other affairs the moment you have sold your first photoplay. Hold on to your steady job and write photoplay in your leisure hours until your salary for six months is equaled by your play income for the same period. Then you are safe in giving up the job if you are certain that you will not write yourself out.

It's Enough.

One of those photoplay school magazine annexes accuses us of being dyspeptic. The way some of these annexes are run is enough to make any regular newspaper man dyspeptic, not to say very tired.

Copyright.

We do not advise that photoplays be copyrighted, but there are many who have sought this precaution. These are advised that the new amendment to the copyright law specifically provides for the registration of photoplays. It is sufficient that one copy of such play be deposited with the Register of Copyrights, Library of Congress. Proper registry cards may be had upon application to the Copyright Office without charge.

Last spring we took this matter up with the Register, Mr. Thorvald Solberg, and found him as much interested as ourselves in procuring the registration to photoplaywrights and we are certain that those who do business with the copyright office will have no cause for complaint. Since Mr. Solberg became the Register he has made his department a model of efficiency, and the most exacting could not ask for greater promptness or more courteous treatment.

Please note that the law provides for the registration of the photoplay and not merely the synopsis or scenario. By photoplay is understood a script consisting of a synopsis, cast of characters and a plot of action divided into scenes and so clearly worded that two directors, working from the same script, will produce substantially the same story. This is not the official definition, but our own, but we think that Mr. Solberg will confirm the definition.

Remember that a copyright is not like a patent. The office merely accepts for registration any proper matter for which protection is claimed, and issues a statement of such registration. It is not a guarantee of priority, but merely the registration of your statement of such priority. It is up to you to prove your point and collect damages for infringement.

Go to.

One of our regular correspondents notes that several inquirers have been asking about typewriter paper and offers the helpful suggestion that where it cannot be obtained at the stationery stores in the smaller towns, it is almost a certainty that it can be had of the local printer, who stocks the various weights for letter heads and will cut the paper for the author. Go to the printer.

Mr. Reid Speaks.

We are in receipt of this letter from Hal Reid, head of the photoplay department of the Universal Company. It seems to be partly in reply to an answer in the Inquiry Department in a recent issue and in part a statement of position.

> The Universal Film Manufacturing Company will be very grateful to you if you will publish this letter in regard to prices paid for scenarios. We pay, and have paid within the last month as high as $100 for a scenario, others at 75, 50, 35 and 25 dollars, and are perfectly willing to pay for a scenario worth the price, the sum of $500. In other words, nothing can be offered to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company which, if deemed worthy, will not be cheerfully purchased at any price.

Please Don't.

When you get a script returned with the statement that it is not available for present production, don't write the editor and ask if it will be available later on. George Terwilliger sends in a letter Reliance receives in which the writer asks him to tell this and many other things. If the script suggests that the company will be able to use it later on you will be asked to send it back about a stated time, if you have not made a sale elsewhere in the meantime, but otherwise not available means that the company does not want your script and is trying to tell you so politely.

And don't "get back" at the editor. He's a hardened sort of cuss or he wouldn't be holding down the job and your fine sarcasm and rounded periods of denunciation merely make him laugh a little. Here's something the Universal reading office got the other day.

> I recently sent you a finely humorous and effective scenario, which was returned with the inane comment, "Not suited to picture production," and signed by one "H." I regret that you apparently have no one on your staff competent to stage an original and striking play for moving pictures. This may account for the quality of the stuff which you do present. I assert that the scenario sent you IS eminently suited to picture production, and for the value of my time—$150 a week, I will come to New York and stage it for you and give you the very best production that your firm has ever put out. This is no bluff, but a grim reality.
> Yours, SILAS WEGG, of Norfolk.

That sort of thing is just plain stupid. It is not going to sell your script, it doesn't bother the editor and since you've had the fun of writing it and eliminating it from your system, why not throw it into the waste basket yourself and save the editor the trouble?

There is not an editor in the country that is not looking for comedy. There is not an editor who does not welcome it when his search is rewarded, but just because it sounds funny to you don't get the idea that it must be funny. The test is whether it will look funny on the screen.

Don't get hot headed and write get backs. That only amuses the stupid brute who can't see your story. Be mean to him. Be real mean. Don't let him have any more of your scripts. After he has made sufficient number of enemies he won't have any more scripts and the concern will have to go into bankruptcy, so he'll lose his job, and that will serve him good and right for not taking your fine scripts. That's the way to treat those fellows. Don't write to them. They like that.

Wants to Know Why.

We like to get letters from Steve Talbot because he usually has something to say. This is what he says this time:

> Another question, which—"has Banquo's ghost in a recumbent position when it comes to downing"—not by regular "downers"—I have never seen it downed in your column yet, but by that part of my mind which I devote to the downing of questions repeatedly brought to my attention.
> WHY the emphatic warnings, instructions, advice—as you will—of all text books, "helpful hint" articles in trade publications, instruction slips, etc., of manufacturers, against the introduction of crime, drinking, gun-play, stabbing, murder, burglary, escaping convicts, offenses against the moral law, barroom scenes, etc.? WHY?
> I have long wondered, and probably many others who see the products of either the Licensed or Universal companies, are wondering who writes them. (The Film Supply Company's product seems to be the only one of the three producing aggregations free from the above features, and they put one over occasionally, via the American Company.) Does it not seem a fitting subject for wonder, when we are told so often that stories will not sell if we heed not the warning?
> I have no grievance as a writer on this score, because I have never written a photoplay which contained any of these supposedly objectionable features, nor have I felt the need of them to carry a story through. But as a patron of photoplay theaters, I should have grounds for being aggrieved, were I of the army of fault-finders.

As to us, I am always amused and curious at the prevailance of these things in pictures and sometimes much bored when I have put before me on the screen, that ever present bit of so subtle [illegible] which announces and concludes "THE HALF-BREED'S CRUEL REVENGE" and its brethren—i. e., "Passed by National Board of Censors."

Perhaps an apology is due our faithful and obliging guide, "The Photoplaywright," for this query. If so, I herewith tender same. But surely, this question has tormented hundreds of writers, both amateur and otherwise—if "otherwise" they have ever too busy indorsing checks to submit it to you. At any rate, it seems to me, who have an inquiring mind and no great influx of checks to indorse, that some light could and should be shed upon this mystery, and in the interests of the many, I herewith submit it.

Most instruction books suggest the avoidance of the prohibited topics, not because they are absolutely prohibited by the Board of Censors, but for much the same reason that we give a child a rattle instead of a razor to play with. Scenes of crime, even murders, are permitted under certain conditions; the condition largely being the manner in which it is done and the reason for which it is done. It is taken for granted that the novice cannot handle the situations with the cleverness that is required and so they are advised not to write these scenes. It would be well if the advice should be followed by all, since it is so seldom necessary to employ crime and violence to gain effect, but recognizing that there is need for some latitude in the matter, the Board of Censorship will pass (and note, please, that it passes; not approves) certain phases of crime, but requires that these crimes shall not be the main theme of the story, that the moral to be drawn shall be a good one, and that the crime is not made too conspicuous

It is not the fact of the murder that is objected to, but the manner in which the murder is accomplished. A brutal fight terminating in the death of one of the combatants would not be permitted where the scene could be run in part where "breaks" are used, so that the start and finish of the fight are shown with some other scene in between.

It is a matter of so nice a degree that the beginner is urged to keep away from such things, hence the apparent discrepancy. Just as a matter of fact, a large proportion of these violent scenes have their origin in the studio-made script or even are interpolated by some director. But because it is done is no reason why it should be done. The script not based on crime stands a better chance than one that is. Leave crime to others if you can dispense with it.

Testimony.

Here's a letter from a man who has found himself and who gives his experience for the benefit of others:

> Following your "crackerjack" matter under head of Photoplaywright is the excuse for this letter, so you will pardon a beginner for butting in. I've followed the newspaper game twenty-two years, and when the scenario germ "got" me, I did what the nine-and-ninety do—"rush in where angels fear to tread." I imagined I could write as good, if not better, scenarios than some I viewed. When the first came back, more than two years ago as "not sufficient action to theme," etc., I paused a bit. Yet, I kept at it after Giles Warren (bless him) wrote one of his from the heart letters and said, "The editors thought so well of this story that it was sent to the directors," etc., but it came back. In all the intervening time I tried with perhaps twenty scenarios, and failed to make good. But they couldn't feaze me—I kept coming back at them, but I had to change style. Instead of writing "fail to get over in the picture" stuff, I analyzed the stuff on the screen. Result, two weeks ago I sold my first. Snapped up three days after mailing. Then Hal Reid wrote that he was holding another for consideration, which, personally I believe better than the one that sold. This is merely to cheer up some of those who are wavering. It pays to work and wait, keep eyes open and imagination keen, and when a scenario comes back read and "see" it, to find out why it didn't find a resting place.

Here's a man who worked on and off for two years to learn the tricks of the trade. He didn't write foolish letters to editors, he did not declare that the work all went to the inside writers. He reasoned that there must be something the matter with his stuff and so he studied his stories and compared them with the results on the screen, not all the results on the screen, but the best work. Then he saw why it was he did not "get it over" and changed his style.

When your story comes back, do you go into executive session with it? Do you question the reason for its failure? Do you rise up more convinced than ever that the trouble is with the editors and not with the story? We know lots of people who read merely to convince themselves that they are right. There is no hope for such. Be your own best fault finder and after a while you will not find so many faults.

Want Hal Reid's Goat.

If you would capture Hal Reid's goat, stroll into the Universal office and hand him eight or ten number one and number two plots. If you do not know what these plots are here is the answer! The number one plot has it that they love, quarrel and make it up. Number two starts something like this:. "Colonel Brierley had two sons, Bob, who favors the North, and Jim, who, like his father, is a true Southerner." You know the rest of it. There isn't a photoplay editor in the country who cannot guess with reasonable accuracy as to the way it works out.

Eight out of ten average scripts are number one stories, and about twenty per cent. of the remainder are war stories on the same old theme. They come in by the dozen and the score, and no editor ever said he wanted that sort of story.

Listen.

What the editor wants from you is the big, gripping story that he can't think of himself. He can think of some, but not of enough to keep the product going, but he isn't going to pay you for the commonplace idea that any trained studio writer can turn out in an hour. He doesn't want just stories. He wants good stories. Get that again.

He wants good stories.

He wants stories with appeal, with heart interest. Heart interest doesn't mean love stories. It means an appeal to sentiment, to the emotions. The best heart interest story we ever saw didn't even have a mild flirtation in it, but it had heart interest in every three-quarter-inch frame of the thousand-foot reel.

If you can write that sort of story you can sell just as many as you can write, and if they offer you ten or twenty dollars for it call it back and send it somewhere else. It's worth more and you can get more, but the chances are that the first studio you send it to is going to lock it right up in the safe until they get the release slip signed. When one of those stories comes in everybody rejoices, but they don't come in every day.

We are not talking of Hal Reid alone. We mention him because we were in his office this morning and saw him suffer. The condition obtains everywhere, Licensed and Independent, eastern and western. The market is flooded with a mass of messy stuff written by authors who think that whatever they put down on paper must be a story. If you are still in that stage save your postage and the editor's flow of language. Don't give up, but practice and study until you can get a new twist to your ideas, until you can write something that is better than the average, not merely just as good. No matter if the correspondence school did tell you your scripts are good. That doesn't make it so, and some of the poorest stuff that comes into the studios comes from those schools that have a selling annex. Don't send your stories out until they are better than merely good. Then you won't declare that scripts cannot be sold.

Don't Bump 'Em.

Here is a letter from Hal Reid. It's funny, but it has its serious side. He says:

> Mr. George Hall, of the Staff of the Universal Film Mfg. Co.'s Scenario Department, has thought out several different things which he has sent on to Washington for copyright, wherein and whereby people can get injured in motion pictures without being hurt by an automobile.
> If you will kindly give this space in your paper you will very much oblige and save the lives of a number of scenario editors who are constantly compelled to read of injuries received from being hit by an automobile.

Did you ever use an automobile to bump someone with? Of course you have. It "looks interesting" and it's more stylish to be kicked by the front wheel of an auto than to have your hero slip on a banana peel, but think of the poor editors. You have just this one little bump. You do not realize that there are perhaps fifty scripts a week that have the same thing in them. Be original even if you have to make the heroine sprain her ankle by stumbling over a match.

That Dinner.

Elsewhere in this issue Mr. Blaisdell's story of the Photoplay Dinner will give the full account of the first gathering of those whose interest lies in the production of photoplay stories. It was a truly representative gathering in every way, and but the first, we hope, of many to come. We want to offer our personal thanks to all who made the dinner the success it was. There will be a second dinner in about three months under the guidance of a committee composed of Phil Lang, for the Licensed editors; C. B. Hoadley for the Universal, and Harry Harvey for the Film Supply. If you were not at the last dinner be at the next. If you were at Henderson's last Saturday night we do not think you'll need a reminder.

Self Explanatory.

"We wish you would carry in your notes this week, mention of the fact that we are desirous of ascertaining the address of the following people. We hold scenarios for them, but we have no means of learning where they are located. Your co-operation in this matter will be sincerely appreciated.

Yours very truly,

SARAH BERNHARDT PLEASED WITH PICTURES.

Regarding her recent appearance in the motion picture subject, "Queen Elizabeth," now being released by the Famous Players Film Company, Madame Sarah Bernhardt writes as follows:

"It is with a feeling of gratitude that I turn to the God of genius, to offer him prayer, for that wonderful miracle he hath brought about, whereby he hath given men the power to hand down to posterity the greatest success of my career—'Queen Eliabeth.' It is a great joy for me to know that my masterpiece is within the reach of all the people throughout the universe, and I hope it will be appreciated before and long after I am gone."

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"BACK TO THE OLD FARM" (Essanay), Sept. 3.—A picture that will encourage those who are dreaming of buying a farm and getting out of the city. The story that the picture tells doesn't seem very fresh or vital, but it serves very effectively indeed to contrast the old break-back and kill-soul methods of farming (they are very truthfully shown), with the modern and far easier way of making machinery do the hard physical work on a farm, and these also are essentially truthful. So interesting indeed are these views that they raise the picture to a high place among releases as an offering to the public. The early scenes (they are dream memories of the old farm), are finely acted and there is much art in them. The picture's only weakness lies in that the parts do not hook together very convincingly, and the elopement end was neither necessary to make the picture popular, nor was it good art. The camera work is all that was to be desired.

"BUNNY'S SUICIDE" (Vitagraph), Sept. 6.—Bunny plays a ne'er-de-well whose wife (Flora Finch) gives him a rope to hang himself. The comedian's attempts to put himself away at the noose end of a rope end in his making a swing. There was laughter, for slight as is the situation, fun is acted into it.

"SHE WANTED A BOARDER" (Vitagraph), Sept. 6.—A slight but amusingly acted farce. It made laughter.

"THE LONELINESS OF THE HILLS" (Kalem), Sept. 6.—This title was or might have been given to the picture to serve as an excuse for its hero's action. He takes an Indian squaw to wife. The picture shows how he won her by helping her tribe overcome their enemies in battle. There are a good many figures in the battle scenes, they show much smoke and are fairly effective. The photography of the important scenes is good and the picture, as a whole, is a little above the average of its kind.

"CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE" (Selig), Sept. 6.—A triangular love story in which one of a girl's two lovers knows that his rival is innocent of a crime charged against him; but lets him go to prison on circumstantial evidence and only confesses that he had withheld testimony years later. The plot-making shows care and the story is clear. It lacks character-drawing, but has very interesting backgrounds, one of which is road-making by prison labor on the "Colorado Honor System"; we see the men at work, also the tent village where they sleep. William Duncan plays the hero; Lester Cunio the villain and Myrtle Stedman the girl. Others in the cast are Marshall Stedman, the old minister; Josephine West, the hero's mother; with Otis B. Thayer, Rex de Rosselli, and Warden Tynon in other roles. It is an adaptation from Hapsburg Liebes', "The Little Good," and was produced by Otis B. Thayer.

"SERGEANT BYRNE" (Selig), Sept. 5.—A love story of the great Northwest, with a mounted policeman (Thomas Santschi) as its hero and with Eugenie Besserer in the role of its heroine. It is not a one-situation picture, nor is the suspense at any time very tense; but it is interesting. Once or twice, but especially when the tame wolves try to get the heroine's baby (the widow has been turned out of her hut), it seems artificial and thin. The photography is not first class in many of the scenes. In the cast are Herbert Rawlinson, as Drake; Wheeler Oakman, as Sergeant O'Rourk, and Ferdinand Galvez, as Bill Jones. The picture was written by Lanier Bartlett and Colin Campbell and produced by Colin Campbell.

"THE SMUGGLER" (Lubin), Sept. 5.—A somewhat conventional, tragic story of fisher folk, smuggling and chase by the soldiers. The plot is simple and the story clear. The backgrounds are bits of an interesting, rocky shore. The chief characters are a fisherman who is the smuggler; his daughter, and the captain of the soldiers who is in love with the girl. The costumes place the story in France. It is well acted by the leaders; but the work of the man who played the colonel didn't add much to the effect of the closing scene. As entertainment it is very fair.

"THE WILDMAN" (Essanay), Sept. 5.—A farce in which Dad, through the freshness of one of his daughter's lovers who thought he was planting a trap for the rival, finds himself glued to a log. The only way he can get home is to leave his trousers with the log. A canvas and some leafy boughs, etc., serve as the finishing touches to his costume. He is seen on his way home and hence the wildman. Mr. Missimer plays the role. There is both fun and entertainment in the film; but it is too slight and thin to be rated very high.

"GETTING RID OF TROUBLE" (Biograph), Sept. 5.—A kitchen and dining-room farce in which the "trouble" is the cook; but there is an annoying collector on the front porch also. These both are got rid of together. They are pitted against each other. There are many extremely laughable things in it and a large Broadway audience seemed to find it very amusing.

"HE MUST HAVE A WIFE" (Biograph), Sept. 5.—In this farce, the nephew, who, as usual, needs a wife to get the check from his rich uncle, dresses up and plays his own wife. We had supposed that this situation had been pictured until it was dry; but the Biograph producer has thought up a new twist to it. It also, like its companion piece, was enjoyed and made laughter.

"CAPTAIN BARNACLE'S LEGACY" (Vitagraph), Sept. 4.—Nothing could be more winsome than the way little Dolores Costello plays her role in this picture, in its opening and closing scenes. As a comedy, the picture is unfortunate. The captain's African legacy, with its "conditions" and the adventures that he and Captain Bunce have in getting possession of it are just a tride out of good taste. It will not widely offend; but it will not widely appeal to spectators as very funny. As an adventure, it gets across better. It is only a fair offering. Van Dyke Brooke is Barnacle; Hughy Mack is Bones and Kate Price and Flora Finch are burnt-cork negresses.

"DOWN THROUGH THE AGES" (Kalem), Sept. 4.—In this picture, Gene Gauntier, Jack Clark and others of the Kalem Company now in Europe, play a conventional story against a background of the ancient temples and statues of Egypt. The plot is only so so; but keeps the story clear and serves its purpose which is to use the courts and porches of these great temples. The story goes back into old days; but doesn't succeed in making them seem real. What it does do is to make the backgrounds more interesting than a mere travelog would be, at least to the average spectator, and because of this, it is a success. It is a release that is desirable, well photographed and deeply interesting.

"ALADDIN UP-TO-DATE" (Edison), Sept. 4.—The comedy opens with the theft by boys of a lamp left for a moment unguarded by an itinerant peddler. The boys later leave the lamp on a beach, where it is found by Edward O'Connor. He rubs it, to get the sand off, and things happen. He is enabled to get the girl of his choice, in spite of the opposition of her parents; clothes for himself, a home, an automobile, and outfit for his wife. The laugh comes when the comedian rubs the lamp and a brand new baby is brought in. The picture will entertain.

"A TRAGEDY OF LONG AGO" (Cines), Sept. 3.—This historical tragedy has been elaborately staged and carefully produced. It is a worthy production.

"LOCKED OUT OF WEDLOCK" (Pathe), Sept. 4.—Charles Arling makes a lot of fun in this comedy. He brought many laughs out of a Broadway audience, and that in itself is a feat. It is a picture not to be missed.

"THE PENALTY PAID" (Pathe), Sept. 5.—The reviewer missed the first part of this picture, but he saw enough to enable him to say that it is a fine Western. It is early Indian drama. Gebhart and Princess Red-wing have the leads, and their work is of their regular high standard. There is splendid photography and rare scenery, especially panoramic views of mountains. There is a thrilling pursuit in canoes through the smooth waters of a shaded creek and a hand-to-hand combat in the water that are particularly effective.

"GEE! MY PANTS" (Pathe), Sept. 7.—Crane Wilbur as a doctor on his way to a patient has a number of experiences distressing to himself and more or less amusing to others owing to his hat being blown into a stream and his taking off his trousers to wade into the water. A tramp gets the "pants" and Crane had to get a blanket from his carriage. A whole lot of things happen before he gets home.

"BRIDGET'S SUDDEN WEALTH" (Edison), Sept. 7.—Edward O'Connor as a policeman and Alice Washburn as a maid with an unexpected inheritance make a lot of fun.

"OPENING OF THE Y. M. C. A. PLAYGROUND AT LYNCHBURG, VA." (Edison), Sept. 7.—On the same reel as the foregoing there are fine pictures of the dedication of this playground. Standing out above the others, by reason of the marvelous photography, are the water scenes in which are pictured the canoe and motorboat parades.

"TWILIGHT" (Essanay), Sept. 6.—Francis X. Bushman and Martha Russell present a most tender and sympathetic portrayal of a retrospect, brought back to them by reason of the engagement of their granddaughter. Harry Mainhall and Ruth Stonehouse carried the parts of the young lovers.

"A WASTED SACRIFICE" (Vitagraph), Sept. 7.—Strong Western drama, in which is injected something that is novel and thrilling in the way of a large snake, which is shown first coiled ready to strike, and then is seen to elevate his head and hit. The ending, while it may not be as pleasant as some may desire, at least has the virtue of being the logical and righteous one. The picture is well put on.

"A LITTLE FAMILY AFFAIR" (Lubin), Sept. 7.—For the first time in a long while this writer has seen an Arthur Johnson film, and he is tempted to say it is worth waiting for a long while. Surely we cannot get too many of such as this. Lottie Briscoe plays opposite to Mr. Johnson, and by her fine work substantially contributes to a most successful comedy-drama. For comedy there is aplenty, especially when Lottie (the players are under their proper names) adds to the decoration of the living-room by placing alongside of the old-fashioned portrait of the dear sweetheart of the crabbed aunt a most interesting nude figure. The character of the grouchy aunt is most effectively played by Madge Orlamond. There are several strong dramatic situations, which are handled as Mr. Johnson so well knows how to handle them.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 37."—Chief among the interesting features of this number may be the pictures of the visit of the son and daughter of President Taft to Montana and the close views of Blackfeet Indians, under Big Top, assisted by Little Quiver. There are some tribal dances, which an Indian-surfeited public may appreciate, knowing they are the genuine article.

"BELIEVE ME IF ALL THOSE ENDEARING YOUNG CHARMS" (Edison), Sept. 6.—A picture illustrating one of Thomas Moore's songs by the same name. It was accompanied very sleepily by the little pianist and as far as we can know, the music killed the picture. It is a good melodrama, but it isn't a lyric photoplay, not such a one as "Silver Threads Among the Gold" was. That picture was a masterpiece. The Edison Company did it. Would they would make another.

As a melodrama it has many excellent things, a good story being not the least of them, but there is nothing in it that equals the work of Miss Laura Sawyer, as Helen Van Worth, the villainess. That is sheer art, a perfect picture of vindictive contempt. We seldom see anything in pictures so good. The picture shows us the love story of an artist (Benjamin Wilson plays him well), and a model (Bessie Learn is very acceptable in this part). Helen Van Worth (Laura Sawyer) is the rich woman who also loves the artist, and, from jealousy, comes very near separating the true lovers forever, but they meet again.

Beside well designed and clearly articulated scenes it has excellent photography. We may add that the better companies are not showing in pictures bad paintings any more. The work on the easel before the painter in this picture is a very good copy of a well-known work of art. The whole is an excellent offering.

"THE DARLING OF THE C. S. A." (Kalem), Sept. 7.—A very acceptable war drama founded on a story of exceptional heroism on the part of a young Southern belle. The story is a gem and the plot on which it is pictured is well designed, and, with the careful conduct and the good acting, makes it a desirable offering. It has scenes of great beauty. We have noticed it at length in a former issue as a notable film.

"THE UNSEEN ENEMY" (Biograph), Sept. 9.—The quality in which Biograph pictures most excel is the atmosphere of individuality that surrounds each player, making him or her distinct from all others. In no other make of picture is it so marked. There is much of it in this very effective release, but not as much as usual. The object of the picture is to create a feeling of dread and the means it uses is to place two little girls in a locked room, and put them in danger from an "unseen enemy" in the adjoining room. This enemy is a drunken maid, who, with another rough character, is bent on blowing up a safe. There is a hole in the wall made for a stove pipe and the woman can thrust her arm through this and shoot, but she can't see to aim, because the hole is too small. Her purpose is to keep the children from using the telephone. But it lies on the floor where the eldest girl had dropped it and the sound of the shots is more eloquent to bring help than words. The little girls are charming; they are not yet actresses, but in a good place to learn acting. The photography in many scenes is not up to standard.

"THE GIRL REPORTER'S BIG SCOOP" (Kalem), Sept. 9.—A newspaper and high society life picture giving us the adventures of a young girl reporter (Hazel Neason), who gets a big scoop on the reasons why an international marriage was broken off. The newspaper woman plays housemaid at the mansion, just to get a photograph of the pair, but the flashlight, when she makes it, shows the count just about to make off with the gems given to the bride-to-be by her friends. The story comes out smoothly and is clear. Dealing as it does with high society people in typical backgrounds, a fine country place, and also with newspaper work, it will appeal strongly to the many. The photography is excellent in some scenes, not in all.

"THE HALF-BREED'S SACRIFICE" (Lubin), Sept. 9.—A picture of Mexico that is unusually obscure for a Lubin; it is not at all easy to get more than a blurred outline of the story. In the first place, the camera is too close to most of the scenes, so close that the backgrounds don't seem to join each other properly, and this is confusing. Also, with such small scenes and with the action almost instantaneously continuous in two or even three of them, the action itself becomes disconnected. Someone darted out of one scene, picked up a rock in a different scene and threw it at a window in another different scene, all in a breath, as it were. We were wondering what the man was about and didn't have time to see who it was. The half-breed limped; the man who threw the stone didn't seem to limp, and we thought, wrongly, that it was the don. The scenes seemed to have been purposely made to hide the story rather than to tell it. From first to last the picture is confusing, a very weak production.

"THE RANCHMAN'S TRUST" (Essanay), Sept. 7.—One of the new members of the Western company has the lead in this story, and he will make a distinct addition to the working force. His manner is engaging, he has good stage presence, and he will competently fill the place of the leading member of the company in the event of enforced absence. The story is well put on, and there are many people employed in the cast. A novelty is a wedding party on horseback, and it makes a pretty picture as it leaves the church, with a great range of hills in the background.

"THE HIGHER MERCY" (Vitagraph), Sept. 10.—A war-time picture which gives us a very engaging glimpse of Abraham Lincoln's home life and his fatherly affection for Tod, his little son. Mr. Ince's Lincoln has, in some of its scenes, the same accent on the great President's heavy mindedness which, as shown, we feel to be a mistake, but in these lighter scenes, he has probably struck the right note. It is very fine and human. The hero of the picture, a cowardly soldier who had once saved Tod from drowning, is played by Mr. Morrison, and is just the same figure that we had in "The Seventh Son."

Cowardice, even when it is explained away, so far as the spirit is concerned, by being shown as an incurable physical defect, which the coward is burdened with and which he can't help, is not and never can be so effective a theme for art as courage, even if it is due to physical perfection. The half-light of science is deadly to art. The soul knows instinctively the sources of its life and its power. Scientific truth will never compel the soul to love anyone because of degrading imperfections; too many men have overcome in spite of weaknesses. In this case the aim is not love, but pity; it is not a very high aim.

In the cast we find Julia Swayne Gordon, as the soldier's mother; Rose Tapley, as Mrs. Lincoln; Norma Talmage, as the soldier's sister; Kenneth Casey, as Tod; Hal Wilson, as a colored servant, and Florence Ashbrook, as Tod's colored nurse. The picture was written by Charles L. Gaskill and produced by W. V. Ranous.

"THE MANUFACTURE OF PAPER" (Edison), Sept. 10.—This may be called the sequel of the big Maine logging pictures that the Edison Company has been releasing. It is equal to them in the epic bigness of what it shows and makes an absorbingly interesting offering. A picture that is worth while; for it gives excellent photographs of big undertakings.

"THE WOMAN OF ARIZONA" (Essanay), Sept. 10.—This single situation picture is made dramatic and effective by the competent work of the Essanay leading woman, "the Woman of Arizona." She and her husband (Arthur Mackley) are running a ranch. They are kindly people and help a blanket-stiff, who repays kindness with treachery. He is such a cool blackguard that, after he has nearly killed her husband and has been wounded by the sheriff, he comes back to the cabin and the woman, believing his lie, protects him. Later, she learns the truth. The photography is clear and the story gets over well.

"THE SACKING OF ROME" (Cines), Sept. 7.—This is a picture of the last sack of Rome, by the Bourbons (1527). It gives a series of very interesting scenes, of which some are very good indeed, but most are poorly photographed; a defect that practically nullifies the love story which is of the slightest at best. The picture stands on its two best scenes, without which it would have been of little account.

"PICTURESQUE SARDINIA" (Cines), Sept. 7.—Sardinia is an out of the way island. We don't hear much about it, consequently these pictures (the photography is not of the best, however), are doubly acceptable.

"THE HOUSE OF HIS MASTER" (Selig), Sept. 9.—A picture that aims at pathos by showing as a faithful, kindly, old darkey servant, who sacrifices himself for his young master. It is not a powerfully convincing picture for the situation seems rather carelessly (easily) developed, and fails to come to grips with real life more than once or twice. Mr. Paul L. Feltus, the author, had a good idea which apparently he hastened to hammer into a salable scenario rather than fuse into a work of art. Its producer, Lem. B. Parker, having probably to get out a picture to still the clamor of spectators who want the curtain to go up, put it out just as is was. Consequently the offering has commercial value, that is all. Frank Tobin plays the young master; Kathlyn Williams, his wife; Joseph Hazleton is the darkey (a conventional characterization); Frances Mason is a gypsy; Mae Barnes, Pat Carson, and James Long are men of her band. The young master's fast friends are W. Stowell, W. Fontinelle, E. Murray and R. S. McKee. The photography is only so-so.

"THE FIGHT IN THE DARK" (Solax), Sept. 4.—"Everybody's doin' it"—that is, of course, the so-called Western. There's no reason why a picture should be taken on the Pacific Coast in order to constitute it a Western. If there's a Mexican in it, and an American, and likewise a Mexican girl; plenty of melodrama, some fighting, a lot of pursuing ahorseback, and a general slambang from start to finish such as will make the small boy get up on his feet and root, it may very properly be called a Western—and this is one of 'em.

"DON'T PINCH MY PUP" (Thanhouser), Sept. 8.—The purists may complain about the slang in this title, but to Young America it will have the virtue of terseness. The story is well told. It involves the child of a laborer who befriended a stray dog—a little fellow. In order to keep the police from getting the dog for non-payment of the dog license the youngster saved his pennies as he earned them. A boy and a dog will always appeal to an audience. There is no doubt this pair will.

"GERONIMO'S LAST RAID" (American), Sept. 12.—In these two reels there are much of shooting and riding; much of the melodramatic. From a spectacular point of view it may be said to be a success; from a dramatic it is not. Too much attention has been given to creating action, to keeping men and things rapidly moving, and not enough to establishing human interest in the picture and then sustaining it.

"CUPID VS. CIGARETTE" (Majestic), Sept. 15.—If this picture had been held within a half-reel it would have entailed no sacrifice of action essential to the understanding of or the quality of the piece.

"LOVE'S SERENADE" (Gaumont), Sept. 10.—This is a pretty comedy-drama. It traverses a honeymoon, a separation a year later and a reunion a year following that at the very hotel where the couple spent their honeymoon. The acting is clever and amusing.

"THE KIND OLD MAN" (Eclair), Sept. 8.—We find a very good story in this picture in which the situation depends almost wholly on the idiosyncracies of one character, a benevolent old bachelor; but its action, at first, is slow. A short story may hold the interest when the character drawing progresses slowly; but the best motion picture needs a somewhat speedier progress such as we find in this picture only in the last portion. The flavor of the picture is thoroughly good. It tells a pleasing love story, romantic, fresh and wholesome, and it will be widely liked.

"HUMAN HEARTS" (Imp), Sept. 12.—A two-reel picture that will probably be a success. It is a good adaptation of the well-known melodrama. The play itself, both plot and story, is too well remembered to need further comment. The picture shows a wise choice of backgrounds, is well acted by most of the cast, and makes the story clear. The blacksmith (King Baggot); his mother (Miss Kelso), are especially strong in their portrayals. Miss Jane Fernley, the player who takes the role of villainess, accents her position too melodramatically. She plays it as it ought to be played behind the foot-lights where the conditions would need playing up to the part; but in a picture doing so makes it lose something of what is most desired, because of unnaturalness. As a whole, it is not so good an offering as "In Old Tennessee," which is far more human and even has a better plot; but the climax in this picture is perhaps more thrilling and this is a point in its favor. It makes a good offering.

"THE MASSACRE OF THE SANTE FE TRAIL" (Bison-101, Universal), Sept. 25.—A big feature two-reel picture; it shows thought and careful planning by its producer and seems even more effective than usual with these big Bison offerings, and the good quality of them is well known. The scenes, taking them as they come, are almost all fine and the story, as it is developed, flows smoothly and clearly. The photography is excellent. It is, indeed, a big feature Indian story, with the elemental thrill and an acceptable love interest. We commend it highly for places where such pictures are liked. It ought to be popular nearly everywhere.

"A TURN OF FATE" (Gem), Sept. 10.—One of the qualities of this picture that will be quickly noticed is its extremely lovely photography of natural scenery. It is a picture in which a Western badman is one of the leading characters. The plot is clear and the story dramatic, at least at its climax which is fairly fresh in pictures if not new to literature; but not all of it is fresh. It stands up with other melodramas and gives good entertainment.

"RANCHERS' LOTTERY" (Eclair), Sept. 12.—The lottery is, of course, matrimony; the ticket is an "object matrimony" ad which is put in the paper by three bachelor ranchers. The situation, it will be seen, is artificial and much of the business of the picture partakes of the same character. The man who got the "old" girl (he thought she was old) got the handsomest one when her make-up was off, it was Dorothy Tennent. It seems a weak picture and is not a very good offering.

"HIS LAST RESORT" (Bison-101, Universal), Sept. 7.—Not long ago the Imp Company released a picture telling a story so closely resembling this that the two seem made from the same scenario. Of the two, the former was more poetic and, as we remember it (the title was "The Land of Promise") it was more effective.

"THE BULLY AND THE SHRIMP" (Reliance), Sept. 7.—A weak picture although its situation is extremely good and might have been worked up into a strong offering. The trouble is wholly with the conduct and the acting which fails to convince.

"A WAIF OF THE MOUNTAINS" (Comet), Sept. 7.—A typical Western atmosphere is found in this picture which is set in New York, near Connecticut. The school teacher rides with the "waif" an ill-treated orphan boy into the next state. The sheriff is following in a buggy with the farmer who owns the boy. At the state line the teacher draws her revolver and keeps the sheriff off. It has the qualities that will please the gallery and has pretty Berkshire scenes that are well photographed; but it isn't for the critical.

"A STAR RE-BORN" (Thanhouser), Sept. 10.—The Thanhouser people have always been very successful in picturing theatrical people. Here is another offering of this kind and it is even better than most of them have been. Its hero (Howard Kyle) is a Shakespearean star who finds himself unable to get work. The heroine (Miss Flo La Badie) is an ex-actress who has married a millionaire (William Russell). The rich woman discovers her old friend in distress and there's a revival of "Twelfth Night," an out-door presentation, in which he is given the role of Malvolio. The story is not tensely dramatic; but accents scene-making. Some of its scenes are fine. This, in a way, is a legitimate aim; but it is not the best use that can be made of the motion picture camera. If Thanhouser stories were, as a rule, up to Thanhouser scene-making, its product would be, we feel very sure, even more deservedly popular than now.

"AN OLD TUNE" (Bison-101 Film Supply), Sept. 6.—The old tune, in this picture of the Southwest, makes a man, whose memory had years before been made blank by sunstroke, remember who he is. He had been a good citizen before the stroke; but after it, a bad man. Now an old tune played by a priest, his childhood's friend, recalls the past just before he is shot dead. The opening scenes are very poetic and very tender as a picture of childhood. The set showing the priest's home is lovely. The continuation of the story is not very effective, not more so than is the average picture. The end is once more in the priest's house. There is much that is extremely good and fresh and human in the picture. We think that it will be liked.

"THORNS OF SUCCESS" (Majestic), Sept. 17.—A melodrama with a variation on the foreign spy interest. The suspense is created by picturing two closely related conditions which work against each other, as plot and counterplot. The spectator keeps asking (a) will the American inventor sell his new explosive to a foreign government rather than to his own, merely because a crafty countess has him in the toils of an infatuation? And also (b) will the foreign agent, who is not herself in love with him, induce him to run away with her from his wife and baby, if she can't get the explosive any other way? There are excellent materials for building a melodrama here; but we can't help feeling that poor use was made of them. The picture shows in its conduct too many little faults in judgment to be effective. We note, for instance, the flourishing of a revolver in a big hotel in Washington and the sentimental crudeness of the final ending. Herbert Prior with Mabel Trunnelle, plays the lead. Miss de Lespe is the countess. Jack Bramwell, Paul Scanlon and William Lamp also have roles. It was written by Robert Goodman.

"LOVE KNOWS NO LAWS" (Reliance), Sept. 11.—A romantic melodrama of the Kentucky hills with the usual heroine who falls in love with a revenue man sent to locate her father's illicit distillery. At the climax she saves him from the moonshiners. It is a picture that will please, chiefly because its producer has wisely followed the accepted formula and as wisely guarded our sympathy for the heroine by making her acceptable to us. He has also supplied new incidents to keep the eye from remembering like things in the scenes in other pictures. These melodramas don't need to be very new; but they do need to be made rightly. This is a very fair one. It will be liked.

"THE BIRTH OF LOTUS BLOSSOM" (Thanhouser), Sept. 13.—A pretty and poetic myth picture of Japan. It was made in America, but was very carefully conducted throughout, and a few Japanese players have given to it a very interesting and markedly exotic atmosphere. To our eyes the costuming seems perfect and the sets and backgrounds in keeping, indeed, it is astonishing in this respect and its producer should be highly commended. The story will interest; it runs smoothly and is clear while at times it is tensely dramatic. The photography adds much to its charm. As entertainment, we place it a good way above the average picture.

"MAUD MULLER" (Nestor), Aug. 30.—A two-reel picture illustrating Whittier's poem and produced by Thomas Recketts. Well-chosen quotation from the poem are used as leaders and not only explain the story but add poetry to it. In fact, the pictures and the quotations are much more poetic than the quotations alone, or the poem itself, for its chief charm comes from the story and not from its treatment. Miss Vivian Rich makes a charming Maud. Not only is she young and pretty, but by her acting she delightfully interprets her part. Donald MacDonald plays the judge with very commendable dignity. Indeed, from first to last, it is a finely acted, worthy production and presents the story quite naturally and convincingly just as it might have happened in the South. Such a story as this is not bound to Massachusetts, not by any means. Every scene seems to have been chosen with care and a true feeling for what is significant and natural; yet not one scene belongs to New England.

In the general construction of the picture and in its division into scenes, the producer has been extremely happy. The first part opens with the first meeting of the judge with Maud in the hay-field and carries us to Maud's half-willing betrothal to the young farmer. The second reel opens with the second meeting of the judge and Maud over the hay cocks. The two marriages follow quickly with the two poetic dreams of what "might have been," that come in later years. It makes a very good production; one that will bear high praise and one that can hardly be too strongly commended to exhibitors. If the story is a bit sentimental, it gets over. The charm of this picture centers especially in its Maud.

"THE ANIMATED WEEKLY" (Universal), Sept. 4.—An interesting number. It opens with an automobile race, that was recently held at Columbus, Ohio, on the occasion of its anniversary. Following this is an item giving portraits of groups of colored people taken at the Negro Business Convention of which the papers have printed so much. Then there is a series of views of a fashionable English coaching event; views of the Woman's Life Saving League at Sheepshead Bay, N. Y.; the notification of Governor Marshall; a cowboy wedding in Chicago; the Cowes Regatta, the greatest yachting event of the year in Europe, and ending with a very pleasing and intimate picture of Ethel Barrymore, with her two children and her husband (R. Colt, Jr.) at their summer home.

"THE HAUNTED BACHELOR" (Eclair), Sept. 10.—A very farcial picture in which Sambo, a burnt cork coon, and his master, the bachelor, have the chief roles. The master thinks he has killed Sambo. The idea might be made to furnish fun; but there is little that is spontaneous or very funny in it as given here.

"THE MARSHAL'S HONEYMOON" (Eclair), Sept. 10.—On the same reel is this picture which begins with a tip-top farce idea. The marshal arrests a man just as he is starting on a honeymoon and forgets about him. The working out of this situation is not so good as one expected, it is rather disappointing. The really human possibilities have been entirely ignored.

"THE TRYSTING TREE" (Champion), September 9.—A clean, simple pastoral drama, well directed and well acted. Glen White and Jeanie Macpherson have the leads. One scene is worthy of special mention, and that is the barn dance. An attempt has been made to portray that familiar function as it is, without caricaturing those who live in the country. The attempt is gratifyingly successful.

"A WHITE INDIAN" (Bison-Universal), Sept. 10.—Fine Indian drama. There is a novel plot and it is well carried out. Mona Darkfeather will attract attention by her vaulting into saddle, or rather what might be the saddle were there a saddle there. A big camp of Indians lends realism to the picture. There is a fine panoramic view of an emigrant camp and the picturesque country roundabout.

"THOSE LOVESICK COWBOYS" (Nestor), Sept. 13.—A comedy based on the misdelivery of three letters from three cowboys who had become enamored of a city girl who had been spending her vacation on the ranch on which they were employed. They knew, of course, the girl's name, but did not have her address. A spinster received the three messages, and promptly replied that she would marry the first man who reached her. There is some good comedy.

"THE GIRL OF GOLDEN RUN" (Bison-Universal), Sept. 14.—Charles Bartlett has the lead in an interesting drama of the city and country. There are some fine suburban views. The characterization of the city girl is strong. With the exception of the absence of clearness in the scene wherein the infant appears the picture is well put on.

"SQUATTER'S RIGHTS" (Rex), Sept. 12.—There are some photographic effects in this drama which are interesting. The picture is well acted, although the situation of the young man who fell over the cliff was rather improbable.

"THE OLD DOCTOR'S HUMANITY" (Eclair), Oct. 1.—A story full of human interest, with great possibilities. It is to be regretted that the village characters were exaggerated, overdrawn. Mr. Scherer, who took the part of the old doctor, made much of his role. The young doctor also gave a sympathetic interpretation of his character.

"IN THE SAN FERNANDO VALLEY" (Nestor), Sept. 9.—A drama strong in spots—a fair release.

"THE FUGITIVE" (Bison-101, N. Y. M. P. Co.), Sept. 10.—A picture of a crime. Years afterward, the guilty, defaulting cashier meets in the West the innocent fugitive; has him arrested but falls sick and confesses. The picture grows dramatic towards the end; but, as a whole, the construction is rather weak. There are improbabilities in it and the acting is, in part, rather unconvincing. The photographs are not as clear as usual. It is interesting and makes a fair offering, nothing above the average.

"TREASURES ON THE WING" (Solax), Sept. 11.—A farce of April Fool's day. Father puts money in a drawer; little girl, for a joke, hides it in a pair of peculiar shoes that Dad had bought, but Mother didn't like. Mother throws shoes out of window to a tramp. When the joke is discovered, Dad goes out to find the shoes and examines the feet of men and women that he chances to meet. There is nothing new or fresh in it; but there is some fun; not all of it is funny though. Billy Quirk is Dad; Blanch Cornwall is Mother; the Solax Kid is the child. A rather weak offering.

"A FRONTIER CHILD" (Bison-101, N. Y. M. P. Co.), Sept. 13.—A very desirable, two-reel Indian picture with the interest largely centered in a winsome little girl, daughter of a trapper. The child happens to be left alone in the log cabin by her mother who goes to visit a sick friend across the hills. The father, looking after his crops, has had an altercation with an Indian and before he can get home, the whole tribe is out on the war-path.

The picture is desirable, because the action is thrilling throughout both reels. It is not a one-reel picture padded into 2,000 feet of film; but a bona fide big feature picture. It is breathlessly dramatic and, though not a single situation picture, the center is kept fairly close to the little log cabin all the time. The photography is of a quality that could hardly be improved and renders the commotion and dread, scattered over a big country, it seems, by the horde of reds that descends upon it very stir-ringly. At the end, we should have been shown the Indians, not only beaten at the fort, but driven out of the valley, because the cabin seems still unprotected after all that nightmare. The picture is so big and thrilling that that is the only criticism we care to make on it. It is a sure winner.

"THE MAN WITHIN" (Nestor), Sept. 9.—It is an old situation, but it still interests, partly because it is a well-acted love story and partly because it has naturally much in scenes and characters that we have never seen before. The climax of the picture is new and gripping, and as soon as we begin to see this new direction that its development is taking, it gains a very lively interest. Too much of it is taken up by old things, and one feels that a good idea was somewhat spoiled. But where the posse pursuing outlaws with a smoky running fight has not been shown too often, this film of the outlaw who, wounded, takes refuge in a home of a man who is about to be elected sheriff, and of the sheriff's daughter who falls in love with him and tries to save him, will be very acceptable.

"THE GHOST OF A BARGAIN" (Rex), Sept. 8.—The bargain was a house; the ghost was a would-be renter, who played spook in order to diminish the apparent value of the house. It was conducted a bit too farcically to be convincing a bit too easily, but it has some good moments. Some spectators are likely to miss the real significance or the drift of the picture until near the end. It makes a fair offering.

"CALEB WEST" (Reliance), Sept. 18.—These two reels are adapted from the novel of the same name by F. Hopkinson Smith. E. P. Sullivan has the title role, and his interpretation is the feature of the picture. There is a strong scene when Captain Bill comes to Caleb and asks him to take back into his home his wife, who had left during his enforced absence and gone to the city with a younger man. The wife, however, had not remained in the city and had returned to the home of a mutual friend immediately after her arrival in New York. Miss Robinson takes the part of the young wife.

"WUN LUNG'S STRATEGY" (American), Sept. 18.—The chief incident in this story, which is played by the new company, is of a bank hold-up which came to naught. A tale of love runs through the play.

"QUEEN ELIZABETH'S TOKEN" (Gaumont), Sept. 17.—This hand-colored picture is worthy of high praise. With two exceptions the scenes are interiors, but the exceptions are notable. The first is of a lawn, with trees in the background, a procession of lords and ladies moving up the graveled walk. The second is the representation of the famous incident where the Earl of Essex removes his cloak and lays it in the mud that the Queen may pass over dryshod. In the background of this scene is a great castle. The picture traverses the story of the love of Queen Elizabeth for Essex and the jealousy of Admiral Howard. The acting and costumes and settings are of the best. It is an exceptionally fine production.

"THE PLAGUE-STRICKEN CITY" (Gaumont), Sept. 12.—Poe's story, "The Masque of the Red Death," is faintly recalled by this spectacular, hand-colored film. The story is rather vague, not so much because we can't see clearly what is taking place as because the picture compels us to supply a beginning. It is as though the heart of a long story had been chosen for illustration. Many of the scenes are extremely fine, tremendous in fact. Some of them are artificial, but all are georgous in coloring. The picture stands, and stands pretty firmly, on its scenes; they make it worth while.

BOOSTING A CITY WITH MOVING PICTURES.

"Pittsburg Promotes Progress" in every conceivable manner. The latest effort is the "Made-in-Pittsburgh" Train, which left Pittsburgh, September 10th, on a 5,000-mile trip through 18 States, stopping to exploit Pittsburgh at 36 of the most prominent points in the Northwest, Middle West and Southwest. The train is really a miniature exposition of the great and varied industries of a great city, complete in every detail. Locomotive, cars and all are made in Pittsburgh, of Pittsburgh steel.

The Chamber of Commerce, under the auspices of which the tour is made, had a cameraman busily engaged for several days making moving pictures of interesting scenes and developments in the city. One reel of film shows the progress in cutting the Hump. Another shows a wonderful panorama of the city, taken from a car on the Mount Washington inclined railway, while others show the busiest streets, millwork, and transportation movements. It is the purpose to show these pictures at the banquets and luncheons tendered the Pittsburgh Boosters along the route and also to display them on outdoor screens near the train, when it is parked for the night stops.

The necessary motion picture equipment is furnished by the Motion Picture Accessories Co., Pittsburgh, and is to be operated by Mr. A. E. Irons, sales manager of this concern. Exhibitors at all the points touched are invited to inspect the train and witness this new adaptation of motion pictures. Every exhibitor along the route should make use of this opportunity to meet Mr. Irons, who will be pleased to tell them of new specialties and accessories Made-in-Pittsburgh.

COMING CINES AND ECLIPSE FILMS.

George Kleine announces for release Tuesday, September 17, an unusually interesting three subject reel dealing with topical, industrial and scenic subjects. In "Traditional Customs in Southern Italy" we are given close views of the peculiar religious ceremonials indulged in by the peasantry, which are not only entertaining in their oddity, but highly instructive as well. The second subject on this reel treats of a matter we are more or less familiar with, but only at a distance. Few of us have not seen the great cannons and modern engines of destruction, but very few of us have ever enjoyed the privilege of seeing the monster guns in the process of making. In the subject "A Gun Factory" we are taken through the famous Armstrong Works, at Pozzuoli, near Naples, Italy, and the various operations, from the melting pot to the transportation of the finished articles are clearly and interestingly shown. A very beautiful series of views of "Amalfi, Italy, and surroundings" has been added to complete the reel, and a magnificent panorama seldom equaled is spread before our eyes.

Scene from "Betrayed for Love" (Cines).

An Eclipse comedy and a scenic form the split reel release for Wednesday, September 18, "A Country Holiday" describes the adventures of three lively young men who fall in love at the same time with an actress who is passing her vacation on a farm and whose sense of humor permits her to have great fun at the expense of her ardent wooers. The scenic subject on the same reel pictures "New Plymouth, New Zealand," in a manner that will be found very pleasing.

As interesting and romantic as the general history of France is to the world at large, there is no period which thrills and fascinates us more than the epoch making days of the Revolution, and that particular time so fittingly called "The Reign of Terror." Robespierre's brief captaincy of the poor, horror-ridden Ship of State will be remembered through the ages as a dark page in French history. An incident which occurred during those days of plotting, conspiracy, mock-trial and wholesale beheading is interestingly portrayed in the Cines film "Betrayed for Love," to be released Saturday, September 21. Amelia Cattaneo and Anthony Novelli are seen in the leading roles, and, ably supported by a large company, they enact in realistic manner an absorbing and thrilling story.

MOREY IS ELEPHANT SHY.

During the construction of the comedy, "None but the Brave Deserve the Fair," in which Harry T. Morey, the Vitagraph player, puts an elephant through his several stunts, the Director tried to induce Harry to lie down on the ground and let the elephant walk over him. He absolutely refused. When the Director insisted, Harry threw off his hat and left the ring, holding up both hands and shouting "Good-Night!" His confidence in elephants had not been tested by any previous experience and he did not care to take a chance. This is one part of Harry's histrionic education that has been neglected, and we would advise that he take a special course in a school of correspondence, on how to act with elephants, supplementing it with a few lessons in natural history or animal training.

D. D. COLEMAN TO BUILD NEW HOUSE.

Mr. D. O. Coleman, of Southington, Conn., is going to build a new opera house there.

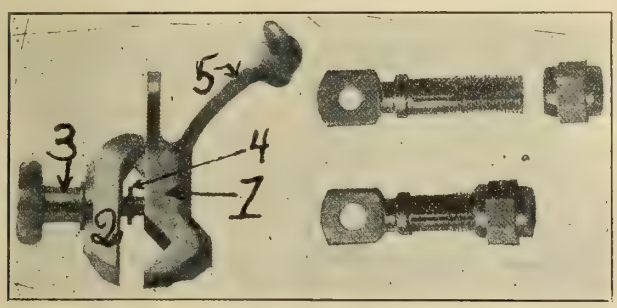
Excellent Terminal Carbon Clamp.

THE Sterling Novelty Co., Warren, Ohio, have sent a sample of the Sterling carbon holder, and Sterling wire terminal, for examination and description in the department. The carbon holder is very well made mechanically, and is strong and substantial at every part. Jaw 1 is three-quarters of an inch deep, by five-eighths of an inch thick; hence is very substantial and could be broken only by the worst kind of abuse. Clamp 2 is three-quarters of an inch deep by three-eighths of an inch thick, with a stiffening rib, giving it a total depth of a half inch. It is fastened to carbon clamp-screw 3 by pin 4, so that screw 3 can be entirely removed, carrying clamp 2 with it. Screw 3 has a four-pronged head, which is excellent for gripping either with the fingers or pliers. The screw itself is a little more than a quarter of an inch in diameter, hence is substantial enough to stand any reasonable strain. Extension arm 5, to which the wire is attached, is two inches in length, and raises up slightly toward its end. In my judgment the holder is an excellent one, and if screw 3 is kept properly lubricated with graphite it would last for a long, long time, giving excellent service.



The terminal submitted is mechanically well made and will undoubtedly make an electrically perfect joint. As is seen in the illustration, the terminal is slotted. There are four of these slots which divide its end into four sections. The threaded and slotted stem is hollow and the threads are on a slight taper. The stranded wire is passed through the nut and inserted in the stem. The nut is then screwed on, and the further on it is screwed, the tighter the wire is clamped. The terminal I can recommend as an excellent article for use either at the rheostat or inside the lamphouse.

Open Vent Flue vs. Fan.

As has been pointed out in this department from time to time, a vent flue from the operating room ceiling to the open air is a matter of basic importance. As we have told both managers and law makers, time and again an operating room is not fireproof, in any true sense of the word, no matter how thoroughly its walls may be fire resisting, unless there is ample provision for the escape of smoke and flame in time of fire.

To build an operating room with fireproof walls, and provide shutters for the purpose of closing the openings into the auditorium, and fail to provide ample means for the escape of flame and smoke directly into the open air is about as sane a proposition as it would be to build the furnace of a boiler and not provide a smoke stack. When the film catches fire, the actual property damage may be confined to the operating room by means of fireproof walls alone. However, you know and I know and everybody else with any sense knows that the flame and smoke must escape, and if there are not means provided to carry it to the open air, then it must force its way out through the crevices of the room into the auditorium, and the moment this happens you know, I know and everybody else with any sense knows what will happen to the audience.

Since we have been agitating this vent flue proposition in the Projection Department, and calling attention to the utter idiocy of building fireproof rooms without means for carrying off the smoke, many theater managers and some of the authorities have recognized the justice of our position, and the installation of vent pipes has become very general; in fact it is now a requirement of law in many cities. However, in no instance that we know of is the law adequate, though some individual managers have put in vent flues which meet every requirement.

Such a flue, to be of much practical value, must be of ample size to carry off all the smoke, since if any smoke at all escapes into the auditorium, then it may just about as well all go there, because once an audience is alarmed and starts on a stampede, it makes little difference whether there is little or much smoke; they will go stark mad just the same.

The principal point of inadequacy in the laws governing this subject lies in the fact that the lawmakers have tried to straddle the proposition. Recognizing the fact that in many houses it would be an exceedingly difficult matter to provide a pipe of adequate dimensions, and law makers have specified an 8, 10 or 12-inch pipe, in the end of which is required the installation of a 16 or 18-inch electric fan. Now this, most emphatically is not good practice. Who and what is going to assure us that this fan will be in operation, or even in operating condition when a fire occurs? If it isn't operating, then we have the proposition of a small pipe, totally inadequate to carry away the smoke—hence we might about as well have nothing at all. And, even though it be in good order and running, it is not unlikely that an excited employee would pull the very switch that controls the fan.

Supposing (and it is not at all impossible) the vent flue fan breaks down and five minutes afterward a fire occurs. The smoke goes out in the auditorium; the audience stampedes and some of them are hurt, or possibly even killed. Who is to blame? The answer is so simple and so obvious that it isn't necessary to give it here. I wish to place the Projection Department on record as asserting that a small pipe, supplemented by a fan, will not fill the requirements of safety, and does not make an operating room truly fireproof. I wish to get further than this, and say that the only truly fireproof operating room, is the room, in which: (a) the walls are fireproof. (b) The wall shutters will automatically close within two or three seconds after the starting of a fire. (c) There is a vent flue direct to the open air, of size sufficient to carry off all smoke without the aid or assistance of a fan. Anything less than this is not safe and is not fireproof.

Los Angeles.

Some time ago I published, in the Department, notation of the fact that I had received certain letters from Los Angeles in which very grave charges were made. These letters came from two different parties. I refused to publish the matter without first asking for corroboration or denial by the Los Angeles Operators' Union. Neither the one thing nor the other has been forthcoming; therefore, much as I regret the necessity, I feel obliged to publish the matter from the fact that, if they are true it is high time such a condition be done away with. The silence from Los Angeles appears to indicate that the charges are at least not altogether without foundation. Briefly, they are as follows: That the examination given operators is a howling farce; that the city receives five dollars from each man and gives an examination which is a joke, and which anyone with the necessary five easily passes. If this is the fact, then the city of Los Angeles is simply operating a swindle. It is obtaining money by false pretences.

I have before me one of the licenses, issued by the city, and I note that the city electrician who does the examining, has not even troubled to use a pen and ink, but has filled in the date, the operator's name, and signed his own name with an indelible pencil. The blank does not even provide a place for the operator's signature, but the city electrician has printed on the bottom, in lead pencil, the words "Operator's Signature," after which the applicant has been handed what seems to be the same pencil and has signed his name with it.

This is all slipshod enough to indicate lax, loose methods throughout. The license in question certainly does not predispose one to believe the examination by which it was obtained amounted to much. The City Auditor and City Clerk signed by a rubber stamp, and the only man who took the trouble to sign with a pen and ink was Lobil De Puty (that's the way it's written, though probably the pen and ink part of it really stands for "Lobil, Deputy City Clerk.") When a city takes a license fee and examines operators, it is presumed that license will be issued only to thoroughly competent men.

The charges go on to state that candidates from a moving picture operator's school of that city, have received license (upon the payment of the five dollar fee, of course) after a ridiculously short course in the aforesaid school, and no practical experience at all. It is further claimed that these students are often given preference in the larger theaters in Los Angeles, and that the competent men, who demand good wages, are, for the most part, to be found in the smaller houses. The writers both say that, while they would not care to make the direct charge that there is graft in connection with the examination, yet, in their opinion, it is either that or its twin brother. The charge is also made that licenses are granted to aliens who are not able to speak our language. This latter, however, I do not regard as wrong, provided the applicant can prove his ability as a moving picture machine operator. I take the position that we have no moral right to exclude the foreign speaking man if he can prove his ability as an operator. One of the writers asks: "Now what can be done?" He then answers his own question by saying, "Nothing, until the managers of Los Angeles give up the idea of trying to secure ten dollar a week men in the operating room, only to suffer many times that amount in loss of business because of poor projection and dissatisfied operators."

I don't want to say any more on this subject, or to comment further at this time. I have suppressed some of the worst charges. Until evidence of their truth be received, I would not care to give them space. However, this department and this paper proposes, so far as lies in its power, to advance and serve the interest of all branches of the business wherever it goes, and if conditions in Los Angeles are as bad as these letters indicate, they should be and will be given publicity for the good of the business as a whole. If the charges are not true, Los Angeles may have ample space to show that fact. If they are true, then it is high time that city got busy eliminating such a disgraceful state of affairs.

Lavezzi's Intermittent.

Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., contributes the following:

Just a word about an article which makes good. Any operator who is troubled with unsteady pictures will be benefited by installing one of Lavezzi's intermittent actions. These actions certainly do give a steady picture. There is absolutely no movement at all. We are running straight pictures, competing with three vaudeville houses. Our admission is ten cents, which also is the admission charged by two of the vaudeville theaters, the other getting fifteen cents. Since installing Lavezzi's action we are playing to S. R. O. We have also put in Lavezzi's three wing inside shutter. Any operator who has installed this shutter and finds that it does not eliminate the flicker, let him cover the two perforated wings with paper and the flicker will disappear. Operators using Power's Five machine should try this: Fill up the balance wheel with lead, even with the hub of the wheel, on side away from the mechanism. You will wonder how you got along without the heavier balance wheel. Another kink: In lining up the machine, set the crater of your arc absolutely at the center of your condensers, up, down and sidewise. To do this, measure the distance from the bottom of the inside of the lamphouse to the exact center of the condenser, first having marked the exact condenser center with a spot of paper; also measure from the side of the lamphouse to the center of the condenser, setting the crater according to these measurements. Next take the condensers out of the lamphouse entirely, turn on the light and look in the front of the projection lens, and ten to one, you will see an image of the aperture located as shown in sketch —which means an out-of-focus effect on the screen. The lining of the optical system may now be accomplished by moving the head until the image of the aperture is exactly in the center of the lens. After you are through, move the lamphouse up close to machine head, until you get a blue spot in the center of the picture. If your optical system is lined up exactly right, the blue spot will be exactly in the center of the light field on the screen. I have improved my light one hundred per cent. by lining it up this way. When will the new hand-book be out? When is an operator not an operator? I will answer that one myself: When he hasn't got the Moving Picture World, which is the operators' and exhibitors' mascot.

As regards Lavezzi's actions, I am unable to confirm your recommendation, because that gentleman has not seen fit, up to date, to send one of them to this department for examination and test. This much I will say, however; that no matter how good the intermittent action may be, it does not necessarily follow that the picture will be rock steady, for the very simple reason that perforation of films is not yet perfect and no intermittent movement could possibly project a steady picture, working with uneven perforations. Mr. Lavezzi's action may be all right. I have no reason to suppose it is not, and if it is a really valuable device, he should take a little pains to show that fact to this department, in order that we may put our seal of approval upon it. I must again point out to manufacturers that the only way to secure the approval of this department is to show its editor that you have the goods. The mere fact that you are an advertiser in the paper does not and cannot carry with it the endorsement of the Projection Department. I am myself inclined to think that a somewhat heavier flywheel would be an advantage on Power's Five, though it would necessitate the use of a very good lubricant on the flywheel shaft bearing on that side. As to the lining up of the machine by your method, I am not prepared to say whether it would work or not. By this I do not mean to cast any doubt upon your statement, but merely convey the idea that operators trying the scheme should do so strictly on its merit. It is important, as has been pointed out in this department from time to time, that the optical system be kept exactly in line, and if your system of accomplishing this result works all right, it is a very simple method and therefore of distinct value. The new hand-book will not be ready before the latter part of October, and maybe not until the middle of November. We are rushing it along as fast as we can, but it is a big job. I have already read and corrected over sixty galleys of proof, and there is still a roll of it here big enough to choke an elephant—some job, my boy—some job. In this connection, let me say that the edition of the old hand-book is entirely exhausted, therefore do not send any more $1.50 orders in. They cannot be filled. The new book will be $2.50, and orders will be filled in the order in which they are received, as soon as the book is ready.

Film Buckles.

Russellville, Ark., sends in a letter on paper, the edges of which are scorched all around, and says:

> We lost our Moving Picture World files in a fire which happened the first part of August. We are going to order the back volumes as soon as we get our office straightened out again. We have a little trouble. It is as follows: The film buckles out from the aperture plate and causes the picture to ride. Tension springs are tight, and I put on a new plate, but it does not help any. Can you locate the difficulty?

My, my, my, what a chance the daily papers missed! A clipping from the Russellville paper shows that the fire did not occur in the theater, but originated through defective electric wiring somewhere else in the building. It is a beastly shame to disappoint the daily papers that way. That fire ought to have started in an operating room, and have given our repertorial friends another chance at the film "exploding." I am surprised that they didn't grab it, anyhow. The mere fact that the fire didn't occur in the theater would not have bothered a New York reporter at all. He would have had the film in the operating room of the theater exploding, if the theater were within five hundred yards of the fire. As to the film buckling, it is possibly due to the tension springs not bearing squarely on the aperture plate tracks. That is the most likely thing. You have not, however, said what kind of a machine it is and that is an important piece of information; also you have not said whether this effect is constant, or whether it is occasional. If the latter, it might be due to dry, shrunken film. Kindly send more complete information.

Operator's Union Wanted.

Iowa writes:

> Would like to find out from you the best way to start an operators' local, the same to be affiliated with stagehands. They wish me to get a stagehand local started; therefore I am asking your advice?

Write to Lee M. Hart, general secretary-treasurer, Suite 63, 39 West Adams Street, Chicago, Ill., who will supply you with all the necessary information. I would have replied to this letter by mail, but could not make out either the brother's name, or the name of the theater at which he works. Those writing personal names should be very careful to write them plainly.

Ghost.

Freemont, Ohio, writes:

> You didn't just understand me about the M. P. lens (August 17th issue). It is a 6½. I will try two 8½-inch condensers as soon as I can get same. I have looked at that ghost until I feel spooky. If I pull the lamp back from the condensers, the ghost disappears, but then the corners are dark.

I am sorry I misunderstood you, and you ought not to need two 8½ condensers on a 6½ lens. Two 7½s ought to fix you up, but your lamphouse should be back far enough so that the front side of the condenser is from 16 to 18 inches from the aperture plate. This is all the advice I can offer you, I believe, inasmuch as you say you have tried about everything else.

Sensible Letter.

Springfield, Tenn., contributes the following:

> I am a constant reader of the Moving Picture World, and expect to continue to be as long as I'm connected with the picture business in any way. I am operating at the Royal Theater, and, if I do say it myself, we have a picture that is equally as good, if not better, than the most I have seen in the cities around here. We have an Edison Exhibition Model machine, and are bucking against a show that has the latest model of another make of machine, and we are "mopping up." I get more information out of the World in one week than I can get from any other source in a month. I was "Jimmy the usher" when I began, though I had a pretty good knowledge of electricity and owe all my knowledge about the projection of a good picture to the department. I cannot see why some people keep asking you such foolish questions. If they would take the time they spend in writing to you and study the situation I think that they would quit it. For instance: I would consider it an imposition on your good nature to ask you why my picture jumps, when we have a machine that is ten years old and the teeth in the intermittent sprocket are worn down. Of course the natural conclusion is that the picture will jump, but I've kept the people from noticing it very much by trying to make up for it in some other way. That salted carbon stunt is the real thing. I've soaked them from four to twenty days and get best results with the following: take a two-gallon bucket of water, dissolve five pounds of salt in it, and soak for four days. I have taken them right out of the solution, dried them on top of the lamp house for a few minutes and put them in the arc lamp and gotten good service.
> My main object in writing this letter was to order a hand book, and, I was about to forget it, please send me one "by return mail" (not express or freight). In conclusion I will say that in a few weeks I think that we will have the latest model Edison machine, and then I know we won't care how much opposition there is. This town only has about 4,000 people, and not enough of them are interested in moving pictures to support two shows, so it's a case of one or the other drop out.

And thus it is seen that things do not always act the same in all cases. In another part of this week's department will be seen the strenuous kick of a brother who says the salted carbons have ruined his carbon jaws, lamphouse, etc. Plainly this brother (Springfield) has experienced no such trouble, nor have others, so far as we know, who have tried the salted carbons. Hence ?????????? The questions which seem foolish to you are evidently not so considered by those who ask them. I am sometimes myself tempted to reply sharply to some of the queries propounded. For instance: what would you do to the man who wrote in, gravely informing you that he had been operating two years and then asked: "Had the little rollers that are close to the tooth-wheels, and that you have to raise out of the way when you thread the machine, ought to turn around?"

Reduced to its meaning the man wanted to know whether or not the sprocket (tooth-wheels) idlers ought to revolve or not. He was not answered, of course. Also, you don't know what unutterably idiotic, asinine things are done by operators and managers. I have seen, not once but several times, moving picture mechanisms sent to a factory in New York from points fully 2,000 miles away, with a howl that the "picture jumped." Nothing else complained of but that. On examination the intermittent sprocket face was found coated with gum and dirt almost 1-32 of an inch deep. This cleaned off, the picture was steady as the proverbal rock. The monumental chump had simply sent his machine 2,000 miles to have the dirt cleaned off his intermittent sprocket. One would not think such a thing possible, but with my own eyes I have seen it—and seeing is believing. However, I think you will agree that the foolish questions are on the decrease. They now mostly come from the small towns and the beginners, and both are to be freely forgiven.

Oil Casing Leaks.

Lexington, Neb., writes:

Perhaps you think the Lyric Theater at Lexington is a dead one, but we can assure you it is quite the contrary. We are reading the department every week; also have your hand book, and we can say that it is one of the best books on the market for both manager and operator. We have a Power's Six, which is in fine running order, except that the cam oil casing is leaking badly. Can you tell me how to stop it? Tightening the screws does no good. Would like also to know of a local union which I can join, and what it will cost a year.

Glad to know the Lyric is still chasing the dimes. Write to the Nicholas Power Company for one of their photographic instruction books, or look at Power's Six instructions in January 3rd issue of the Department, and you will see how to fix your oil casing. Take the cover off, clean its edges, cover them with thick shellac (to be had from any paint dealer), clamping the same in place quickly, and tightening up the screws before the shellac has a chance to set. Don't put oil in for an hour or so. Don't use light oils on your machine, use a good grade of light dynamo oil. Write Lee M. Hart, Genl. Sec.-Treas., I. A. T. S. E., suite 63, No. 39 W. Adams Street, Chicago, about the Union matter.

Lamp Trouble.

Towanda, Pa., writes:

Am using an Edison lamp, purchased early in the summer, and have trouble as follows: (a) My lower carbon (5/8 Electra) gets loose during the run and drops back—not down but back—towards the lamp, 3/8 of an inch or more. Lower carbon gets red at times, and the clamp screws, both upper and lower, burn so that in two or three days a new one has to be used. Side of carbon where screw sets looks as if the screw had eaten into it. Have tried Bio carbons with no better success. Carbons get loose at times. (b) Have been using brass terminals (one described in the Department several weeks ago) and am having trouble with same burning off in two weeks' time. The screw that fastens them to the lamp gets red. I keep lamp and lamphouse clean and connecting points bright. Am using 40 amperes of 110 volt current, through an Edison Economizer, with proper size asbestos covered wire to the lamp. I shall thank you for any assistance you may give in this matter through the Department.

The reason your carbons act thus is that they are not making good contact with the carbon arms, or else there is something wrong with those carbon arms, or else you are using a great deal more than 40 amperes of current—in fact more than 60 amperes I think. I believe you had better send to the Edison Co., Orange, N. J., at once, and get two new carbon arms, and then keep the inside contact perfectly clean, scraping it out thoroughly every two or three days; also file off just a little bit of the end of the clamp screw every day—just barely enough to make it bright and show the raw metal. When the clamp screw burns on its end it forms a hard scale, which has high resistance, and there will be heat generated between the screw and the carbon, which eats away the carbon at the point of contact. I don't remember the terminal you refer to, but it is a funny piece of business that the screw attaching the same to the lamp gets red hot. There is something wrong somewhere, but I could not tell you what it is. The terminal itself would have nothing to do with the screw heating. The indication is that the screw does not clamp the terminal tight on the contact. Surely the neck of the terminal is not too small to carry the current?

Fire Shutters, Etc.

Indiana, writes:

We are remodeling our theater, putting on an addition of 90 feet. Now have a 57½-foot throw; our new throw will be 140½ feet. Use 220 volts, 60-cycle current; 9½-inch Bausch and Lomb projection lens, with a 14-foot picture. What focal length condensers should I use? I would also like to know how you fix the automatic shutters for all openings of the operating room, which I have seen mentioned in the Department. We close down about May 4th, and would like to open the new place in about three weeks. We are to have the only theater in the city, which complies with the fire laws. We have two Power's Six machines, and a seating capacity of 450, but the big feature is the operating room, which is 8 x 22 feet. When will the New Testament be on sale? Three theaters of this city have operators under sixteen years of age. Is there a law to keep such help out of operating rooms? The highest paid of the three gets seven dollars a week. I guess that is child labor.

I am not certain about the necessary focal length condensers to be used with a 9½-inch lens, but should say two 8½-inch lenses would fill the bill. I don't believe you could get good results with 7½-inch condensing lens. I should be glad to hear the experience of operators who have used very long focal length objectives—say objectives of greater length than nine inches. The new Handbook will contain illustrated instructions on operating room shutters. By the "New Testament" presumably you mean the new Handbook. It will be on sale sometime in October, I think. I would not call that child labor, I would call it cradle snatching. No, I guess there isn't any law, but most emphatically there should be a local law clause forbidding the handling of motion picture machines by such children. Managers who permit things of this kind are beneath contempt. A boy less than sixteen years old handling a projector at less than seven dollars per week—fine! It is a wonder those managers would not make their wives do the operating, or put their little eight-year-old kid sisters in. They would not have to pay anything at all then. That would be glorious—from their point of view. By the way: I said in a recent issue that I would supply instructions for the wall shutters without money or price—good night! I've crawled back into my hole. I have something to do besides write letters.

Salt Brine Works Injury.

Manhattan, Kans., writes:

Am a very interested reader of the Department, and would like to say a word concerning brine-soaked carbons. In the first place, there is no doubt in my mind but that they produce very superior light as compared to the untreated carbons. However, they also work some very damaging results to the carbon holders and lamphouse. I gave the matter a very thorough trial, covering a period of three months. In that time they almost ruined my carbon clamps by corrosion. I kept the clamps well cleaned, but this availed nothing. Another thing, the carbon dust is so heavily laden with salt that the lamphouse and clamps become so rusted that they look fit for the junk pile. I oiled the lamphouse on the inside, but it did no good. It was with genuine regret that I gave up the salt soaking. I concluded, however, the improvement in the light was not sufficient to recompense for the damage caused. I would very much like to hear from some of the readers who have given this matter a fair test. We have a new Simplex machine which I consider very excellent indeed. Its greatest feature is the fact that you are able to adjust your shutter while the machine is in operation. The lamphouse and carbon holders are very excellent. There is every adjustment you could wish for and they are all built for business. I want also to tell you of a device manufactured by the Wagner Electric Co., of St. Louis. It constitutes within itself both a device for changing a. c. to d. c., through the medium of a revolving armature, as well as a motor for the delivery of power either from d. c. or single phase a. c. supply. The controlling switch board for connecting the same to the source of a. c. supply and controlling amount of d. c. delivered at the arc. I believe this to be quite an advancement in the d. c. problem for theaters. The device is called Wagner Single Phase Converter.

I join you Manhattan, in asking for reports on this particular proposition. You are the first one who has intimated that the salt did damage. In another part of the Department you will find an enthusiastic letter from a salt soaker, and you will note he mentions no damage to his carbon clamps or lamphouse. The Simplex is a machine containing some very excellent features, although personally I don't regard the shutter setting as of large value. When the shutter of a machine is once set, it should remain that way indefinitely without further attention. The setting of the shutter, while running rather, to my way of thinking, presents to the operator the opportunity of "monkeying" too much. However, I don't wish to be misunderstood. The Simplex is a good machine, and it has the unqualified approval of this Department. As to the Wagner Single Phase Converter, we have invited that company to send instructions and description of their device to this Department for publication, and are advised that the matter is now being prepared.

Camera Man Position.

Oklahoma, asks:

Do the producing companies have assistant camera men? If not would there be any chance for a young man, willing to learn, to get a place and work up to a post as camera man? I am entirely ignorant of the producing end of the game, but have been an operator for over two years and have tried to mix a little brain work in it. I have M. P. Worlds on file as far back as Volume 7, No. 13, and the Department is always first with me.

So far as I know Oklahoma, the producing companies have no assistant camera men in the sense that you mean. The trouble is you are a long way from New York City or Chicago, where the big producing companies are located, and in those cities there are several thousand men right there on the ground, who would like to do exactly what you wish to do. That is the answer, isn't it? The positions are few and applicants, already fairly well posted in moving picture making procedure, are legion.

Valuable Formula.

Winston-Salem, N. C., writes:

In a recent issue a brother wished to know if pictures could be projected without the use of a curtain. The writer for several years worked mysterious effects without the use of any curtain, but as Brother Richardson replied, there would have to be something to stop the light rays. Another brother wished to know about coloring incandescent lamps. Formula:—Dissolve one ounce of refined gelatine in a pint of water, and after boiling it add an aniline or a "Diamond" dye of the color desired in sufficient quantity to render the solution very dense in color. Dip the lamp bulbs in the solution while hot and, after removing them, dry them as quickly as possible. Repeated dipping and drying will render the color on the bulb more dense. The lamp then may be dipped in a thin brass lacquer, or better still, in formaldehyde and again dried. This will render the coating waterproof. Incandescent lamps may be given a frosted appearance by means of sand-blast or by dipping them in a solution of hydrofluoric acid. Should be very pleased to know, all brothers had dropped the words "booth" and "juice."

We are indebted to you for the formula for coloring lamp globes. It will undoubtedly prove to be of much value to exhibitors all over the country, particularly in the smaller towns. It is just another demonstration of the value of this Department in the dissemination of knowledge. I presume those mysterious effects you refer to is the "illusion" effect by means of which a shadow image is reflected; but this requires a very careful and rather elaborate arrangement of lights and stage setting, as well as the gauze "something" to which you refer.

Three-Wire Capacity.

Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

A No. 4 wire is rated at 65 amperes. In that case can you pull 130 amperes from a three-wire system, using the above size wire; that is, could you draw 65 amperes from both sides, making a total of 130. If your automatic shutter does not drop, and after giving it further examination, you found it to be in perfect order, and still it would not drop, what would you do? Would you use a fuse on it, or could you recommend something better?

Plainly, Brooklyn, you are not altogether familiar with the action of the three-wire system. With a three-wire system, the lamps are supposed to, and as a matter of fact do, burn in series with each other. So that the system is not figured as two separate 110 volt systems, but as a 220 volt system, and with that system you could use the capacity of the two outside wires as to amperage, which would be figured at 220 volts, thus doubling the energy capacity, but not the amperage. In other words, 65 amperes at 220 volts would be equal to twice that amperage at 110 volts.

I hardly know how to take your second question. If the automatic shutter was in perfect order, it would drop. If it doesn't drop, then there is something wrong—hence it isn't in perfect order, and the thing to do is to hunt up the trouble and remedy it; but if it cannot be found, then, theoretically, the operator should close down the show until his automatic shutter works perfectly. Practically, however, he will run things with the dowser, watching carefully and dropping the dowser before he stops the machine. If there is no dowser, then he would shove the lamphouse over before stopping the machine.

Another from Brooklyn.

Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

> I wish you would favor me with an answer to the following, over which a few operators are having some controversy: While running your show, the fuses blow. You put in heavier ones, but still they blow. Your lamp is all right, and no ground in the rheostat; what would you do, and what would the cause be? How would you use a stranded wire if it had thirty-seven strands and No. 8 wire? How could you use it?

Under the condition named, I should first test the voltage with my test lamp, as the most likely thing would be a sudden rise in the line voltage. It might also be that two or more coils of your rheostat have sagged so that they touch each other, which might have the effect of cutting out a portion of those two coils, or, in some instances, half or more of the resistance in the entire rheostat. It is difficult to answer a question of this kind, because so much might depend on local conditions, but the two causes named are the things, which occur to me that most likely produce such a state of affairs. A heavy, but intermittent short would cause it also. As to the second query, I don't exactly understand what you are driving at. Why in the world would anybody want to use a stranded cable containing thirty-seven strands of No. 8 wire in an operating room? It would, of course, be possible to do it by making the actual mechanical connection with only two of the strands. Such a question, however, is not a practical one, since certainly no one would want to make use of such a wire as that. Possibly I have misunderstood your question, however. It may be that you mean a No. 8 wire with thirty-seven strands, in which event I would simply say, don't use it at all in a projection circuit—nothing less than No. 6. Referring to question No. 2 again: you could use a copper bar 2 inches square to convey your projection current if you wished to. Electrically, your wire must not be too small but there is absolutely no limit to its largeness—so far as the electrical action is concerned.

Nassau N. P. Bahama I.

Mr. B. W. Yeazel, formerly from Miami, Fla., is now located in British territory, being manager of the Imperial Theater at Nassau. He is one of our old subscribers. He writes, voicing appreciation of the Projection Department and says:

> The Imperial Theater and M. P. Vaudeville Theater, Nassau, N. P., Bahama Islands, will open October 4, 1912. Its cost is $25,000. Seating capacity 600. Everything modern and up-to-date. Independent vaudeville people are invited to write, giving price and date they can come.

Glad to hear from you Brother Yeazel, and to know that your theater is nearing completion. Trust you will have all kinds of success. Let us have a photo of the house when it is finished.

Light Trouble.

Edna, Kans., propounds the following:

> We have an Edison one-pin machine, projecting a 12-foot picture at 72 feet. Have a good clear light on the film, but cannot get any light on the screen for slides on the same focus. Have to move carbons either farther back or closer to the condensers, and then it throws the light too far down on the screen. The light is dark around the outside edges. Is the trouble in the lens or in the condensers? We have one 6½ and one 7½; 6½ next the light. Use half-inch and ⅝ Electra carbons. Which is the best for daylight showing and less eye strain, a "Radium Gold Fiber Screen" or a "Mirroroide"? What is the price of a screen 10 x 14 of either kind? Can an outside shutter be put on an Edison one-pin machine, and give satisfaction, and what will it cost? Our inside shutter is loose all the time. Have to set it every night. What is the cause?

I suppose you do not really mean what you say, Edna, viz.: that you cannot get any light on the screen through your stereo lens. You have not told me the size of the two pictures—that is to say, their width. Quite possibly you are projecting a relatively small stereo picture, as compared to the moving picture, which would cause a condition difficult to manage with one set of condensers. You say it throws the light too far down. If you mean the stereo picture is itself too far down, why don't you raise the lens a little; also be sure your stereo lens sets square with the condensers. Send me the width of those two pictures, describing the conditions again, and I will try and help you. I could not give advice concerning the relative merits of screens through the Department. You don't want to get me killed, do you? You have not said whether your Edison was a Model B or an Exhibition Model. Write to the Kinetoscope Department, Thomas A. Edison, Inc., Orange, N. J., Mr. John Pelzer, Sales Mgr., regarding the installation of an outside shutter. Would suggest you have your local machinist make you a couple of pointed screws and harden the points glass hard. This will probably stop your trouble with the inside shutter coming loose.

Power's 6-A.

Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

> Having often been benefited by your comments on the various letters submitted to the Department, I would like to offer some information regarding my theater, the Etude, 5406 Third Avenue. I have a 14-foot picture with a 55-foot throw, and it is the talk of the neighborhood. Use Power's 6; 40 amperes of 60 cycle, 110 volt a. c. through a Hallberg Economizer. Have inspected and operated the new Power's 6-A machine, and think it is a corker. However, on account of the many adjustments, I am afraid that after a while the lamp will wobble, although the enlarged lamphouse is a vast improvement. I have also noticed and would like to complain about the dotted perforations found intermittently throughout some films. I would like to know the idea of these trade marks, and to whom I could register a kick concerning them. I hope your new Handbook will soon be issued. Am glad to know that the business of the Union is coming to a long-desired focus and that at last it is in proper hands.

The new Power's 6 lamp is very heavily built, and I think you will find your fears will not materialize. They have now been in use quite a while and there are no such complaints. As regards the perforated trade marks in the body of a film, I heartily agree with you in condemning their presence. Would suggest that you write direct to the offending producers. Yes, I think the New York operators will get along all right now—at least I hope so.

From Vermont.

Would like your advice concerning the following:

> Am using 110 volt, 60 cycle a. c., through Power's Inductor, but I want the best picture possible. Would it make sufficient improvement to justify the outlay if I installed a Mercury Arc Rectifier, or a motor generator set? Am using Power's 6 with a 50-foot throw, 12-foot picture. Am using ¾-inch carbons, and get a more even light than with ⅝, but am not satisfied. Do I need a rheostat with a rectifier? How many volts d. c. do I need for my arc.

Unquestionably, Middlebury, there will be improvement through the use of direct current, and either the Mercury Arc Rectifier, Mr. Hallberg's D. C. Economizer, or the Fort Wayne Economizer are excellent devices, and, as for myself, I would not use a. c. for projection purposes at all. In a theater of my own I would immediately install one of these three devices, but I cannot comment, through the Department, or offer you any advice as to which I consider best, but can say that they are all three good. No, you will not require a rheostat with a rectifier. D. C. arc voltage averages about 48. Our correspondents will note what the brother says about ¾ carbons on a. c. He is presumably using not less than 60 amperes at the arc.

First Time.

Galesburg, Ill., writes:

> This is the first time I have broken into the Department, but after reading the Bloomingdale manager's claims for his operator changing reels in six seconds, I had a good laugh. I agree with you that he should advertise himself as own brother to greased lightning. If the manager is the one I think it is, no wonder he talks that way. He is noted for hot-air. He once wanted to employ me as operator at the princely sum of ten dollars per week. Nothing doing! Anyone with common sense knows a reel cannot be changed in any such time. Am much interested in the operators' union and I wish to say this: The Peoria operators are not organized. I worked in Peoria for more than two years, and lost a good job on account of trying to organize a local before the convention last June. During the convention, delegates tried to organize the boys, but they would not show up at the meetings, and they are still without a local. I expect to be a member of the I. A. T. S. E. local here in a few weeks, and hope we can get all of the boys in the city in. Am running a house that was all run down and by good projection and advertising have got the business on the upward path again.

Sorry to know that the Peoria boys are not organized. They are very, very foolish indeed to thus neglect their interests. As to the Bloomingdale manager's claims; I merely printed the thing as a bit of comedy. It appeared first in an advertising circular, which is, in itself, presumptive evidence of its lack of value.

FRANK PHYTHYON BUILDING NEW THEATER.

Mr. Frank Phythyon is building a new moving picture theater at Clymer, Pa. The house will be devoted exclusively to pictures, but if it should ever be desired to show vaudeville, there will be ample stage room. The structure will be built of brick and its dimensions are 31 feet by 92 feet. Mr. Phythyon expects to open the latter part of October.

MUTUAL FILM BRANCH AT CHARLOTTE, N. C.

The Mutual Film Corporation has established a branch exchange at Charlotte, N. C., under the management of C. E. Kessnick. The location of the new exchange is well suited to serve exhibitors in North and South Carolina.

"THE BUTTERFLY" (Majestic).

SOME of the troubles that a man goes through when he marries a society butterfly are illustrated in a picture recently done by the Majestic company under the direction of Robert Goodman. The principal female character in the story is that of a frivolous society girl who might be considered a bit demented on the subject of pleasure. Before her marriage she is a confirmed flirt and after her marriage she still continues her self-indulgent ways, and fails to appreciate the qualities of a good husband. The couple become the parents of a pretty little boy, who is raised more by his nurse than he is by his mother. The little lad's father is heavy-hearted most of the time on account of his wife's frivolity and spends much of his leisure alone.

One day the wife leaves her husband and little boy, to go motoring with a party of friends. Upon her return home for dinner she finds her husband wearily waiting for her with the information that the little boy is very ill. This information annoys the mother to some extent because there is to be a large evening party that night which she would not miss for anything. In spite of her husband's protests the mother attends the ball in festive costume. While the ball is in progress a messenger arrives for the child's physician, who is also at the ball. He hastens at once to the bedside of the little boy and pronounces the case to be one of smallpox. When the child's mother returns she is informed by the father that the lad is suffering with the dread disease.

Her one concern upon learning the nature of the disease is to protect herself and her own beauty. She quickly scans her features in the mirror to see if there are any signs of the disease upon herself. She refuses to go to the sick-chamber of her little boy, whereupon her husband is filled with disgust at her behavior and casts her from him. The selfish mother throws herself upon her bed and falls asleep. She has a vision that her husband is leaving her forever; taking away with him their little child. The dream arouses the mother to a sense of her selfishness and also of her duty. She throws aside her pleasure-loving instincts and rushes to the room of her little boy, ready to take whatever consequences there may be. The doctor arrives shortly after this to announce that he has made a wrong diagnosis and that instead of smallpox the case is only one of measles.

The part of the selfish mother is played by that capable and versatile actress, Miss Trunnelle. There seems to be scarcely any kind of a part that she cannot successfully play. The part of the husband is played by Mr. Herbert Prior, who is always good.

"THE OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS" (Eclair).

We all revere the memory of Longfellow. The most of us love his poems, with their stanzas which enthrall us with their tender sublimity. His was a wizardous imagination to sing in words so simple a presentment of thought so rare.

Eclair essayed a seemingly impossible task, if ordinary standards were the criterion, when it set about to do a picture of "The Old Clock on the Stairs." That they have succeeded beyond belief is proven by a viewing of the picture.

Has it a story or plot? No. Neither has the rose or the lily. But it has beauty of the mystic sort. It is like a dream or a vision which unfolds in animated pictures. Never has been seen the cinematographic camera more cleverly employed in the making of fanciful effects.

It is a picture which will rival their release of Poe's "The Raven," in point of mysterious, awesome effects. It is as their director says "a living pictorial poem."

"Through days of sorrow and of mirth,
Through days of death and days of birth,
Through every swift vicissitude
Of changeful time, unchanged it has stood,
And as it, like God, it all things saw,
It calmly repeats those words of awe;
For ever—never!
Never—for ever."

ESSANAY FIVE-A-WEEK.

Beginning Wednesday, September 25, the Essanay Company announces it will release a fifth film, and on each Wednesday thereafter. The constantly increasing demand for Essanay photoplays throughout the entire world is the best reason in the world for supplying it, therefore look for the corking new releases each Wednesday. The new date will be filled with selections from comedies, drama, melodramas, and Essanay's world-famous Western productions. Each Wednesday, therefore, is a date de luxe for the discriminating exhibitor, likewise each Tuesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday on which Essanay releases. Remember—Wednesday for Essanay.

STEPPLING STILL WITH ESSANAY.

An item in the issue of August 31 to the effect that J. Steppling had left the Essanay Company of players was incorrect. Mr. Steppling appeared by courtesy in one of the Biograph pictures released August 15, but immediately returned to the Essanay Company, where he is doing some excellent work.

"A CHILD'S DEVOTION" (Lubin).

This is one of the famous Arthur Johnson pictures, which gives the Lubin star opportunity for his very forceful acting. It is a child's idea and very true to the prejudice often seen in children to the disadvantage of the stepmother. The noble heart of the boy had to be touched by sorrow before he could be won to tenderness for the excellent woman who had taken his mother's place in the home and heart of the boy's father. The picture, from description of the story, must be extremely pathetic.

Laddie, the little son of a widower, worships his father. The father is in love with a good and beautiful woman and asks her to be his wife. He tells Laddie he is to have a new mother and is surprised when the boy is grief-stricken. After the marriage the new mother tries to win Laddie's love, but the boy's jealousy is deep and her efforts are a failure. A baby sister comes to Laddie's home after a while, and out of love and pride for it Laddie unbends a little towards the mother who owns it. But the little sister dies, and the mother, ill and delirious, stretches out her arms and calls unceasingly for her baby. Laddie sees and hears her and his heart is so touched that he determines to get another one for her. He starts out to find one and in the park, seeing the mother of many children, is surprised when she refuses to spare one, even when he offers his watch in payment. But Laddie finds a baby in a carriage outside a house and wheels it off. He takes it to his mother and when her empty arms are filled, she quiets down and peace comes to her. Laddie takes his father to the house where he got the baby and the distracted parents are reassured. They go and see that their baby is safe and, to save a life, leave it where it is. Laddie's mother, getting better, gives up the baby and once more has empty arms, until Laddie creeps into them and is cuddled to her heart, where he finds happiness. The cast is:

Laddie	Raymond Hackett
Bert Hackett, the boy's father	Arthur V. Johnson
Diana Lane, the new mother	Lottie Briscoe
Doctor	Chas. Brandt
Mr. Gray	Howard M. Mitchell
Mrs. Gray	Florence Hackett

SIMPLEX PROJECTING MACHINE IN EUROPE.

Mr. Rich G. Holloman, who has just returned from Europe, reports great success for the Simplex machine abroad. The first Simplex to be installed in foreign lands was placed in the London Hippodrome, London, England, one of the largest places of amusement in Great Britain. Since that installation the Simplex has been reaching out and conquering new territory in every land.

Mr. Charles Urban and the Kineto, Limited, are the sole agents for Great Britain. Spencer's Limited, of Melbourne, has the agency for Australia. The letter printed on page 1221 under the signature of Moss, Limited, shows the appreciation of the London Hippodrome management for a high-class projecting machine. There are many others who are ever ready to testify to its excellence.

FEATURE FILMS STOLEN.

The Feature Film Company, of 108 East 12th Street, New York, is offering a reward of $50 for the recovery of two of its features that disappeared on September 9, simultaneously with one Max Sokolow, sometimes known as Max Stanley, who rented them for the Graham Palace Theater, Graham Avenue, Brooklyn.

The missing pictures are of German make; the longest one is a 4,000-foot subject entitled "Madeline," and deals with the Franco-Prussian War. The other is a one-reel subject entitled "The Forged Bill." Warrants have been issued for the arrest of Sokolow, and the Feature Film Company is determined to recover its property no matter where he may have taken it. Meanwhile, feature film buyers, renters or exhibitors are requested to notify the Feature Film Company if these reels are offered for sale or exhibition and claim the reward, which is a bona fide offer. The Wm. J. Burns detective agency has been engaged to trace the missing films.

ARTHUR S. MARKS, PRESS MAN FOR DUDLEY.

Mr. Arthur S. Marks has been engaged by M. B. Dudley to act in the capacity of press representative for the Frederick Warde feature pictures.

"ALKALI IKE'S PANTS" (Essanay).

Remember "Alkali Ike's Auto" and "Alkali Ike Plays the Devil." Here's Augustus Carney, the Essanay's funniest comedian, in his great role. Another rip-roaring comedy riot of this renowned Western series.

Coyote Simpson and Alkali Ike both love the buxom Soffie, pride of Buckskin, Ariz. Coyote has a long curling mustache that is his one pride and joy, but Soffie objects to it when he kisses her and orders him to trim it down. Prior to this all three of the boys, Alkali, Mustang and Coyote, have tried to help Soffie with a balky bronco she is driving, and it is not until Mustang mounts the horse in true Western style that things begin to move. Then so fast do they go that the bronco runs itself out of the harness, leaving Alkali and Coyote stranded with Soffie miles from home. Later Coyote proudly shows the boys a fine valentine he has gotten for Soffie, then begins to trim off his mustache. Of course Alkali secures a hideous caricature valentine of an old maid with her false teeth and hair off, and, with Mustang's help they substitute it in place of Coyote's perfectly good one. Consequently when Coyote calls on Soffie with his trimmed mustache and valentine she is about to embrace him when she discovers the caricature and drives him from the house under an avalanche of anything she can lay her hands to. A few evenings later Alkali has invited Soffie to the town dance, and is industriously ironing his pants in the shack, when the boys discover him through the window and, when he goes to get a hot iron, hook his pants through the window with a stick. Very much negligee, Alkali chases around looking for his nether garment, and finally tries to steal a pair from a convenient line, but is loaded with buckshot from the gun of the irate lady of the house. In desperation Alkali dons his old chaps, which fail to cover his exposed anatomy, and leading Soffie proudly into town when he runs across the boys who are holding up his long-lost pants. In the wrangle that ensues Alkali is left in the lurch by Soffie, who goes on to the dance on the arms of Coyote and Mustang, while Alkali wraps his pants about him and strides home cussing everything in general.

Scene from "Alkali Ike's Pants" (Essanay).

This is unquestionably one of the funniest of this funny series, and the players have entered into the spirit of the story with gusto. Of course, Augustus Carney is a scream of joy in his famous role of Alkali, while Mrs. William Todd runs him a close second portraying Soffie. Frederick Church is Coyote and William Todd is seen again in his popular character of Mustang. The film is booked for release September 21.

"ALKALI IKE" AT CHICAGO STUDIO.

What Ho! "Alkali" Ike is in Chicago. Blew in the other day from the West with a six-shooter dangling from each hip, and got the reception of his life. "Alkali" is sure some popular. Whisper!—"Alkali" is featured in some cracking comedies now in course of production at the big Essanay Chicago studio, and they are bigger and better, and funnier, than anything he has ever done. Just put that down in your mental vest pocket, Mr. Exhibitor, and get ready to book!

"THE ELOPEMENT" (C. G. P. C.)

There is a picture which is accorded a prominent place in the majority of English-speaking homes. It is a reproduction of the famous painting by John Lomax, entitled "The Elopement." The story it tells is that of a young man and a maid. Ralph and Rose, who are devoted to each other, but find the road to happiness made hard by the opposition to the match of Rose's father. After many futile attempts to secure the consent of her father, Rose informs Ralph that there is no hope of success and Ralph promptly suggests that they elope. Rose consents and they decide to put the plan in operation at once. They saddle and mount their horses and are off to a lead of a few miles before the old gentleman is informed of the situation. Hurriedly he mounts and gives chase, but the lovers are far ahead by this time.

Scene from "The Elopement" (C. G. P. C.).

They reach a tavern and acquaint the proprietor with the circumstances. The inn-keeper sends one of his men with a carriage to hurry the parson back to the scene. The young couple are soon man and wife, and are receiving the congratulations of the witnesses when a foam-flecked horse and rider arrive. An angry father dismounts and rushes into the tavern, but only to learn that he is too late to prevent the nuptials. However, a little coaxing by his beautiful daughter convinces the old gentleman that it is better thus for the happiness of all concerned and he gives the couple his blessing.

By the artistic coloring of the film none of the beauty of Lomax's charming creation is lost and everyone who has seen the picture will really believe that the delightful characters have stepped out of the frame to entertain them. It will be released on September 17th.

On the same reel is a scenic subject of rare beauty which is described by its title: "Gerone—the Venice of Spain."

CHARGED WITH SMUGGLING.

United States Federal officers under the direction of Walter S. Chance, following instructions from the Treasury Department, swooped down upon the offices of the Star Feature Company, of Philadelphia, and took every book, paper, and personal letter of the manager, Mr. George Graff. After having taken the entire contents of the booking office they next turned their attentions to the shipping office and took every reel of film in the place, completely tying up the shows of the company, which are booked weeks ahead.

It is reported that Mr. Graff has been arrested in New York City on the charge of smuggling in connection with a person by the name of Lexington, a steward on the steamship "Cecelia," who in some way, it is alleged, helped to get the films into this country.

"FATE'S WAY" (Powers).

"Fate's Way," Powers' release for September 20, gives unobstrusively a lesson that it will be well to have young people take to heart. Love may be blind, but Hymen doesn't need to be. This picture offers a contrast. It shows a very unhappy marriage, and then gives, more by implication than by direct statement, a picture of happiness that might have been.

A loving husband finds in his bride a woman addicted to card playing, and who lacked the character to keep her self-indulgence within a sane bound. It was cards, cards, cards, while the home-making went by the board. The husband found none; he even had to get many of his own meals. No pleading moved the slattern card player, and the chasm between the couple grew wider and wider. The husband's vacation came around, and he went to the mountains alone. The real girl was there and they met. He would have got a divorce if she had let him, but had it not been that the wife died, the man would never have known the happiness that might have been had he waited for it and not married so quickly.

Scene from "Fate's Way" (Powers).

Pleasantly sentimental are the closing scenes after the death of the first wife. For the man, called by the affection in his heart, made a pilgrimage to the scenes where he had met the other girl. He found her still there and they were married.

"DOWN BY THE SOUNDING SEA" (Gem).

The Gem Company releases a picture with the above title on September 17. It deals with the sad disillusioning of a simple hearted fisherman who trusted the natural instincts of his heart. He fell in love with the proud lady up in the chateau. She amused herself flirting with him and he trusted her; but when he came to lean upon her affection, it broke in his hand, like a reed, and left him sorely wounded.

Scene from "Down by the Sounding Sea" (Gem).

The setting of the picture is the everlasting billows which give it a very fitting background. The man had a mother and there was also a girl of his own class who loved him. These women were wiser than he and did their best to save him; but he wouldn't listen to their pleas. He was not the kind of man to give up without a struggle. He loved the lady of the chateau and was determined to make her love him.

She saw how things stood and took a cruel but very effectual way of disabusing his mind. She coldly introduced him to her fiance and then passed him with disdain. In the madness that filled him, he lost his balance and was precipitated to the bottom of a cliff.

There his mother found him. He was not dead and the mother and the girl who loved him bore him home where slowly he was nursed back to health. He was now wise enough to appreciate the affection of the girl of his own station and she forgave him and they were happy.

HOW ENGLAND HANDLES ITS THEATER ADVERTISING.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of The American Film Mfg. Co., who has just returned from Europe, tells some interesting things of theater advertising in England.

"Flying A Day."

"I found many theaters in the heart of London advertising exclusive Flying A days," said Mr. Hutchnson. "The custom is spreading fast and seems to be highly successful. Theaters are more pretentiously decorated and generally show more attention to details in that manner than we do here. In addition to the usual posters are many colored banners and flags all combining to make a most inviting bid for business."

AMERICAN FINISHES STARVED ROCK FILMS.

The sixty odd players who have been encamped at Camp Hutchinson, Staved Rock, Ill., making pictures for the American Film Mfg. Co., returned to Chicago last week, after completing the purposes of their journey on the famous and historic rock.

The camp was a model of its kind, and residents of the neighborhood were sorry to see it go. During its six weeks' stay it proved a curiosity to the many thousands of visitors and entertaining many big gatherings, such as lodges, conventions, etc. The Cook County Press Association and the Illinois Senate Committee on the Deep-water-way-to-the-gulf problem were among the official visitors, as well as Governor Deneen and notable lecturers, doctors, and lawyers sojourning at the Rock.

FLICKERS.

George A. Blair.

A FLEETING glimpse of the smiling countenance of Mr. George A. Blair, who assists Col. Schuyler Colfax in the joyous work of selling Eastman raw film stock to the American picture manufacturers, cheered us in our busiest hours of toil on Wednesday last. Mr. Blair happened to be in the vicinity of the New York office of the Moving Picture World and couldn't resist a desire to stop long enough to say "how do you do." He was accompanied by a co-laborer, Mr. Richard Brady. Blair was looking comfortable upon the occasion of his visit, notwithstanding the temptations of a great city and the recent heated term. It is some inspiration to look, if but for a moment, upon these emissaries of great projects and we returned to the grind with renewed vigor after a hearty clasp of his calloused palm. No, he didn't hand me anything.

Mr. Edwin Earle Naugle, managing editor of the Metropolis, of Jacksonville, Fla., dropped into the New York office of The World last week armed with credentials from our friend Frank Montgomery. Mr. Naugle spent a week or so seeing things about New York before returning to the "demnition grind" on The Metropolis. He is some fellow and not an entire stranger to the Great White Way.

Mr. B. Nichols, European representative for several American manufacturers who has been in the United States for the past three weeks, sailed for London on the Mauretania, Wednesday, Sept. 11. Mr. Nichols reports a very satisfactory trip, having accomplished the object of his visit. He was also kind enough to concede that he had noticed a general improvement in the American product since his last previous visit and expressed the belief that some of the American manufacturers of pictures were making an effort to produce better work. Mr. Nichols expects to return in about four months.

Herman Mason, of the Masko Film Company, is taking things easy these days at his office in the 45th Street Exchange Building. "Our big picture 'Resurrection' has proved an excellent feature and is being well received wherever shown. Although we have some of the best territory yet to dispose of we are already out of the woods" was his very pleasing message.

Joe Koster, German representative of the Republic Film Company, who has been visiting friends in New York for the past few months, sailed on Tuesday, September 10, for Dusseldorf. He will stop off in London to confer with Mr. Edmundson regarding the marketing of Republican features.

Col. J. E. Pearce, of New Orleans, Sah, was in New York recently, looking over the picture situation and basking in the glare of the "white lights" of Broadway. Col. Pearce is interested in several magnificent picture theaters in New Orleans.

Mr. Alfredo Gandolfi, president of the Ambrosio Film Co., Turin, Italy, is in America, making final arrangements with the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., which is to market Ambrosio Films in this country. While in the States, Mr. Gandolfi can be located at 15 East 26th Street, the new offices of the company, which are under the supervision of Mr. M. A. Stevani, president of the American Ambrosio Co.

A. Warner, president of Warner's Features, Inc., left town for a short stay in the "Smoky City," and is expected back in his 45th Street office about the end of the week with a few more leases for branch offices in his wallet.

Mr. F. J. Carroll, vice-president and treasurer of the Cheyenne Feature Film Co., Denver, Col., is in New York creating a market for the Cheyenne product, and is located temporarily in the Exchange building, 145 West 45th St.

Mr. J. G. Ross, of the British-American Film Mfg. Company, Montreal, Canada, was in New York in the interests of his concern last week. Mr. Ross said that his company has completed a number of pictures and is very well pleased with the results. The dates of release have not yet been determined. It is the intention of the British-American Film Company to produce a number of subjects of romantic character, dealing with life in the Canadian wilds.

Mr. and Mrs. William L. Shelton, of Kansas City, were visitors at the New York office of the Moving Picture World on September 5. Mr. and Mrs. Shelton are proprietors of the Ashland Theater of Kansas City and have been enjoying an extended vacation in the East. They attended the exhibitors' convention at Chicago and came East by easy stages to Boston. From New York they went by boat to Washington and thence home. Mrs. Shelton was greatly interested in the process of the making of an issue of the Moving Picture World, which was at its height at the time of her call and informed us that she was an old newspaper woman herself. To her "copy" and "proofs" were familiar subjects. Although Mr. and Mrs. Shelton saw considerable of New York on this visit, they declared their intention of attending the exhibitors' convention next year.

Mr. Jack Warner, traveling representative for Warner's Features, is back in the "big city" after a short stay in Augusta, Ga., at which place he established a branch office. Mr. Warner will leave for Buffalo this week, and later for Boston for the purpose of opening up new renting offices. Mr. Edward Cramer, now assisting Mr. Warner in New York City, will assume charge of the Boston office.

William Tait, Jr., manager of Lubin's Theater, Baltimore, Md., paid a hurried visit to New York's theater supply and equipment houses for the purpose of brushing up on the latest improvements in lighting and decorating exteriors and interiors. Mr. Tait is one of those very progressive managers with an unlimited desire to add to the entertainment and comfort of his patrons.

M. P. Harvey (better known in his own town as Moving Picture Harvey), assistant manager of the Lyric and Neil theaters, in Champion, Ill., which are operated by the Lyric Amusement Co., is now on tour for several weeks with a vaudeville company getting ideas for attractions to run in his own houses. Besides managing, Mr. Harvey does all the singing for his show.

I have discovered an excellent substitute for gas or drowning, and strongly recommend it to those who are tired of living, and wish to jump from one world to the other QUICK. Accept an invitation from H. A. Spanuth to go motoring, and allow him to drive you through some busy streets in the city.

MISS WILLIAMS AS "LADY BOUNTIFUL."

Miss Kathlyn Williams, the talented leading woman of the Selig players, presided at a party given to some 200 slum kiddies at Steavenson Theater recently. The children had previously taken part in a Selig production, "The Trail and the Germ," made to assist in the fight against the "white plague" in Chicago. That picture with others of an educational character were shown for the entertainment of the children. Ice cream was served.

CONVICTS MAKE PRESENT FOR MISS STEDMAN.

Miss Myrtle Stedman, leading woman of the Selig Company of players located at Canon City, Col., was presented with a beautiful hand-carved and inlaid center table made by the convicts of the Colorado State Penitentiary, before whom she sang on several occasions.

DIRECT CURRENT ARC CONTROL.

In line with the general trend for better picture projection, Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports the installation of a Hallberg A. G. to D. C., 60-ampere Economizer at the Park Theater, Bensonhurst, L. I., N. Y. Also a 220-volt D. C. to D. C. Economizer for Goldstein & Perkins, Punta Gorda, Fla. Also a 30-ampere Rectifier for Family Theater, A. J. Bayer, prop., St. Mary's, Pa.

Foreign Trade Notes

A CORRESPONDENT of The Moving Picture World writes interestingly from Berlin, Germany, telling of a great exhibition and convention to be held simultaneously in the capital of the German Empire from December 15th to December 22d of the current year. At this meeting, to which The Moving Picture World has received a special invitation, all interests in the moving picture industry are to be represented. The affair is not limited to Germany, though most of the delegates, manufacturers, etc., will be from Germany. Our correspondent writes, that almost all the American manufacturers will have some representation. It is expected that a special demonstration in the American methods of advertising the show will be given. The German manufacturers will point to these methods as both effective and unobjectionable and hope to convert the German authorities by means of these posters, etc., to a saner and more liberal regulation of lobby advertising. All the great manufacturers, German and others, will have their own little theaters where their pictures will be projected free of charge for the benefit of visitors to the exhibition.

The Parisian police have declined to join in the general crusade against motion pictures, which has startled the people of southern France and for a time assumed the proportions of a riot. Though there were not wanting many who in the city by the Seine echoed the savage cry against the motion picture, the Parisian police continued its sane and safe policy and does not assume to interfere, unless there is a very striking violation of the decencies and proprieties of life.

The important profession of operating motion picture machines in France seems to have fallen on evil days according to a letter written to a French trade paper by M. G. Crepy, a gentleman who seems to take a very deep and practical interest in projection. He launches out against what he calls "occasional operators," who bring untold harm upon the industry. Mr. Crepy has started a movement for examining and licensing all French operators and distinguishing those of special ability by bestowing upon them some mark of merit, such as a medal or diploma. He is the treasurer of the Friendly Group of Operators.

The Italian government has put the cinematograph to a most unique and humane use. Moving pictures, which show the wives and families of those at the front, have been specially taken, and an operator dispatched to Tripoli to show them to the soldiers when they are not engaged in actual fighting. All the families of that famous regiment, the Eleventh Bersaglieri, have walked before the camera, and know that their "loved ones" now have the pleasure of seeing them in what is the next best thing to actual life—the shadow-world of the cinema.

ADVERTISING AND EDUCATING BY CINEMATOGRAPH.

[From Deputy Consul R. J. Novakovitch, Belgrade, Servia.]

American fashions seem to have become suddenly popular in Servia. Within the last half year one frequently sees in Belgrade men—and more particularly young men—with their hair cut in American fashion, while their clothes bear unmistakable signs of the local tailor's effort to imitate American styles.

These facts, and the unprecedented demand at the stores here for hats, boots, and other wearing apparel of the kind in vogue in the United States, make one, out of pure curiosity, seek the reason for this newly evinced taste for things American; and investigation seems to point to the cinematograph show, especially the production of moving pictures depicting life and events in the United States as the main factor in creating this demand for American goods. American "turns" are the chief attraction of the cinematograph shows here. The scenes greatly appeal to the people, so much so that the younger generation, as already said, try to imitate the actors in outward appearance. This circumstance in itself suggests the possibility of utilizing the Servian liking for moving-picture shows to boom American manufactures by cinematograph.

Some Lines That Could Be Thus Introduced.

The adoption of this suggestion does not seem to present much difficulty. It is to be expected that proprietors of existing shows would be only too glad to enlarge their regular programs by a few "turns," attractively depicting the manufacture or utility of this or the other American article, especially if the necessary films were placed gratuitously at their disposal by the interested firms. The risk, as some might contend, that the likely scope of business to be done in this country (roughly 3,000,000 inhabitants) would not warrant the expense of having the films made, could be practically eliminated by arrangements for their display in other cities of the Balkan Peninsula—Sofia, Adrianople, Constantinople, Saloniki, Athens, Bucharest, etc.

Fairs and agricultural exhibitions offer, incidentally, good opportunities for direct cinematograph advertising by showing to those interested modern agricultural implements and machinery in actual use and operation. As few Servian farmers have as yet had opportunity to visit moving-picture shows, the novelty of the thing could not fail to leave a lasting impression. Agricultural machinery and implements have been mentioned only as an example. There are many articles which, though in general use in more advanced countries, are as yet practically unknown here. Railroads are being built just now throughout the Balkans, opening up new territory and creating new or modernizing existing industries. Woodworking machinery and mine equipment are two other classes which have a bright future in the Balkans and offer good reward to the enterprising business man.

To Aid the Immigrant.

[From Consul General R. M. Bartleman, Buenos Aires, Argentina.]

For the enlightenment and education of the newly arrived immigrants lodged at the Government's hotel in this city it has been decided to install the moving-picture plant which was used in Argentina's display at the Turin Exposition. It is expected that the views of the country and its agricultural and cattle industries will be a help to the immigrant in adapting himself to his new surroundings.

There are 55 moving-picture theaters and 45 cafes showing moving-pictures in Buenos Aires. In 1911 nearly $850,000 United States gold entrance fees were collected, but this amount does not take into consideration the returns of the cafes. The Republic imports about 2,000,000 meters (meter=3.28 feet) of films annually, the duty on which is 27 per cent on an appraised valuation of $4.83 (United States gold) per kilo (2.2046 pounds), a film 2,000 feet in length weighing about 4 kilos. At the present moment dramatic films of a comic nature have the run. Western (American) cowboy films are also great favorites, as well as industrial films, but comedy, magic, trick, fantastical, allegorical, and sensational films with plots are all well liked in South America. The average bill at a theater is consistent with the size of the programs given in the United States.

Supervision of Juvenile Attendance.

[From Consul F. B. Keene, Geneva, Switzerland.]

There are in Geneva (a city of 132,000 inhabitants) not less than 10 permanent cinematograph shows, several cafes where occasional presentations are given, and two or three places where the display of films partially serves as an advertisement. It is said that each day 140,420 feet of films are unrolled before the eyes of the public in Geneva.

The Department of Justice and Police and the Department of Public Instruction are about to prepare a ruling (1) to regulate discipline of public school children when out of school, following other Swiss cities in this line relative to home-going time, smoking, public spectacles, etc., and (2) to forbid entrance to public places where cinematograph views are shown to children not accompanied by their parents or guardians, exception being made in the case of films prepared for school children and approved by the department of public instruction.

THE SUBSTITUTE MODEL (Sept. 16).—Millicent Carr was the steady, prim and serious little stenographer of the manager of a great dry-goods store. At home, her little sister suffered terribly from headaches, which were diagnosed as proceeding from the eyes, and a great specialist pronounced an operation as immediately necessary. But where to get the money? Their slender store held no such sum, and they were despairing when a chance was offered in a most unexpected way. The store model, who was being dressed for the annual competition at the Fashion Show, fainted, and Millie, who was of her figure, begged for a chance to act as substitute. More out of sympathy than anything else, the manager permitted her to try on the dress and then her real beauty and attractiveness, concealed before under her stiff and prim attire was revealed. She won the first prize easily, the operation was performed and, her sister's eyesight saved.

THE BRAND BLOTTER (Sept. 17).—Jim Wandless, the owner of a few hundred head of cattle, and Dulcie Brent, the daughter of a rich cattle baron, are in love with each other. Mowbray, the foreman of Brent's ranch, is also in love with Dulcie, but she does not care for him. Jim asks Brent for his daughter's hand. Brent likes Jim very much but is exceedingly jealous of his daughter, so he tells Jim that he can marry Dulcie when his herd of cattle matches Dulcie's, head for head. He hopes in this way to put Jim off and discourage him. The young people are forced to accept this mandate. Later, however, Dulcie sees how she can hurry matters somewhat and begins to put her plan in operation. Her cattle outnumber Jim's three to one. Her brand is the well known V. C. She realizes how easy it would be to change this brand into the "Diamond Eight," which is Jim's brand. She rides out to her herd, ropes and ties one of the steers and is in the act of changing the brand when Jim rides in and sees what she is doing. Dulcie rides away, leaving Jim bending over the prostrate steer. Brent and Mowbray ride on and see Jim in the act of releasing the steer. They notice the changed brand and at once jump to the conclusion that Jim is a brand-blotter. Things go hard with Jim until Dulcie confesses and Jim is cleared. Brent now realizes how dearly the young people love each other and gives his consent to their union.

INTO THE GENUINE (Sept. 19).—Urged on by her parents, who, though their fortune is rapidly on the wane are trying to keep up appearances, Margery Blackburn inveigles Bob Manners, a rich and popular young broker, into a proposal of marriage. A few days later Bob is caught on the wrong side of the market and, in an exciting pit scene in which over five hundred members of "The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America" take active parts, his entire fortune is swept away. Hearing of a great gold-strike in the Klondike, Bob decides to go forth and recoup his fortune. He calls on Margery to say goodbye and to ask her to wait for him. The Blackburns, however, expose their cupidity by telling Bob that marriage with Margery is now out of the question.

Bob goes to the Yukon Territory, but is not successful as a prospector. After weeks of nerve-racking torture his food supply gives out. In the delirium that follows, he imagines that he has found gold. Nellie Morgan, a trapper's daughter, finds the senseless prospector lying beside a stream, a piece of worthless rock clutched in his hand. She nurses him back to health, with the inevitable consequence—they fall in love. Bob and Hank, the trapper, locate a rich gold mine that makes them independently rich. Later Bob is called back to New York by the illness of his mother.

The Blackburns hear of Bob's return, and his good fortune, and Margery immediately sets out to catch him again. Bob, however, is now proof against her wiles and is merely polite to her, for his love has gone from the sham into the genuine.

LIFE AND CUSTOMS OF THE WINNEBAGO INDIANS (Sept. 20).—The Winnebagos were the most powerful and intelligent of the mighty Siouan family that were left in the middle west after their forebears, the Sioux, had drifted further West to give war to the fast encroaching white man. For many years the Winnebagos roamed through Illinois, but at present their largest settlement is in the Black River Falls district of Wisconsin. While they are essentially "woods" Indians, they take a keen interest in farming. They still prefer to live in wigwams, although their tribal characteristics incline towards the more modern methods. The Winnebagoes are not a vanishing race, and their standards of morality and education place them among the highest type of modern Indian.

In this exceedingly interesting educational picture, the manners, customs, sports, and pastimes of this proud and haughty tribe are shown in a series of intimate, picturesque scenes. One scene shows them at their bead weaving. Another view shows their adeptness at canoe making and repairing. Still another scene gives us an idea of their strange games. Their renowned ceremonial dances are also shown.

A DETECTIVE'S STRATEGY (Sept. 23).—This picture tells the very human story, or romance, of an unloved wife and mother, who, although possessing wealth and social position, craved the love of her husband. This love has been denied her by the husband, who is blinded by his wild rush after the almighty dollar. There comes a time when Stanton McVicker, a species of the fortune hunting society man, ensnares the heart of the woman and gains her consent to an elopement. The husband, hearing of this engages Edwin Randall, a handsome society detective, to ferret out the case and prevent the elopement. The wife, however, through her great love for her only child, relents at the last moment and decides to remain loyal to her husband. She confesses all to the detective, who destroys all the written evidence against her, warns the intruder, McVicker, away, and smoothes the path of misunderstanding between husband and wife. After telling the husband that his wife is good and true, Randall severs his connection with the case and, when their little child appears upon the scene, all unfriendliness between the mis-mated couple disappears and happiness once more reigns supreme in the household.

THE CATTLE RUSTLERS (Sept. 24).—It is time for the annual roundup at the great Moore ranch in Colorado. May Moore, the cattle baron's daughter, is engaged to her father's foreman, Jack Towns. As the Moore cowboys are about to start on the work of rounding up the vast herds, a man, giving his name as Jim, applies for and secures a job as puncher. He is a spy in the employ of a neighboring band of daring cattle rustlers.

That night, when the camp is sleeping, Jim steals out and signals the rustlers to start their work at once. They descend upon the herd, overpower the watchman, and stampede the cattle towards the fastness of the nearby mountains. Jim, the spy, decides to carry off Moore's daughter May, as his own special prize. He tells May that her father has been injured and that he has been sent to take her to him. May believes the spy's story and rides behind him on his horse. Through an accident May learns of the man's treachery and, with her screams, awakens the sleeping camp. The chase that follows is long and thrilling but finally the desperadoes are captured and the cattle found. Punishment is meted out to the rustlers, and Jack and May are reunited.

PARTNERS (Sept. 25).—Tom Stuart and Don Morton are joint owners of a small cattle ranch, and are united by a strong bond of affection. Tom is to be married to Melisse. She in turn loves Don—not wisely, but too well. Tom learns this secret from a half-breed, Jan Thoreau, who has been well thrashed by Don for forcing his unwelcome attentions on Melisse. Tom hears of his partner's supposed treachery, before Don, who is thoroughly ashamed of concealing the truth from his partner, has an opportunity of making a clean breast of the affair. Tom doesn't credit the truth of the half-breed's accusation until he questions Don at an unfortunate moment. Don resents his interference and when Tom insists that he marry the girl at once, they have their first and only quarrel, which is so serious that a continuation of joint interests is impossible. Tom magnanimously turns over his share of the ranch to Don and the girl and leaves.

The half-breed has overheard the quarrel and, smarting from the thrashing he received, after Tom leaves, shoots Don, and then reports to the Sergeant of the N. W. M. P. that he had heard the two men quarreling and saw Tom shoot Don. Tom is accused and arrested, but the half-breed takes water when confronted with conclusive proof of his share in the tragedy. Tom goes away and returns after many years, to find his old sweetheart still faithful to the memory of his friend and partner.

THE PITY OF IT (Sept. 26).—A foolish young wife, susceptible to flattery, succumbs to the blandishments of an unscrupulous villain and, with only imaginary reasons, leaves her husband, a misstep she had reason to regret only once, and that was for the balance of her life.

Tom Morton, her husband, heartbroken and desperate, lets go of everything and sinks about as far down as a man can. He falls into good hands, however, and is restored to a sense of reason and tries hard work as an antidote for bitter reflection. His wife, now a cast-off plaything, finds him and begs forgiveness. He forgives, but cannot forget. She sadly leaves her last hope only a few moments before her accidental death.

THE BORROWED UMBRELLA (Sept. 27).—Smith gets caught in the rain and buys a bargain umbrella. He takes a great fancy to it on account of the convenience of the curved handle, which enables the umbrella to be hung on the arm. Wilson becomes engaged to Smith's daughter, Nellie. Not wishing her fiance to get wet, Nellie loans her father's umbrella to him. Wilson buys a cigar and leaves the umbrella hanging on the cigar counter, from where it immediately is pilfered. Later, Smith notices that his umbrella is missing. Nellie tells of loaning it to her fiance. Smith orders her to phone Wilson to return it at once. Wilson gets the message but cannot find the umbrella. He writes a notice, asking anyone who took an umbrella to return it to Room 16, and posts it at the hotel desk. Then, in order to humor his father-in-law, he goes to a jewelry store and buys an expensive umbrella. Smith, however, wants his "bargain" umbrella, and will not be pacified with the expensive gift. Wilson is in despair, but, upon returning to Room 16, a great pile of umbrellas greets his eyes, evidently left there by people with guilty consciences. He grabs the pile and once more goes to Smith's house. Smith easily picks out his "bargain" and all ends happily.

HARVESTING ALFALFA IN NEW MEXICO (Sept. 27).—An educational subject dealing in an interesting manner with the great agriculture industry of the Southwest.

CINES.

A CAVALIER'S ROMANCE (Sept. 24).—The Court of France in the reign of Louis XIII, had many fair ladies, but none more beautiful than Anne de Beausac. The gay Count de Rambeau falls violently in love with her and earnestly endeavors to win her heart. Anne is also smitten in return, and many tender meetings take place between the lovers.

In the midst of the ardent courtship the green-eyed monster, jealousy, appears to harass the infatuated count. He sees his loved one in the arms of another, and swears to kill his hated rival.

Following an insulting message, a challenge is readily accepted, and a duel follows. In the midst of the fight, a messenger appears and summons the count to go before the king. De Rambeau hastens to obey, but soon returns to finish the encounter.

In the meantime, however, Anne hears of the affair and hastens to intervene. Throwing herself between the combatants, she beseeches them to cease, and puts an end to the contest by explaining that the count's supposed rival is her brother.

CASTROVILLARI, SOUTHERN ITALY (Sept. 24).—Located in the southern part of Italy, this quaint town contains many objects of interest. We are shown the principal streets, the Castle of Angione, a group of ancient houses, doorways and iron balconies of the VIII century and many pictures of local costumes and customs.

ECLIPSE.

THE SACRIFICE (Sept. 25).—A terrific riot rages in the street, and the troops are finally called to the tumult. When calmness has been restored, Major Browning discovers a child lying helpless and forlorn in the roadway, and learning that her parents have been killed, decides to take her to his home. A few weeks later, the child makes such a charming impression that the major makes up his mind to adopt her.

As the years roll by, little Susie remains under the major's fatherly protection, and they become so attached to each other that he even decides to break with his fiancée.

When Susie reaches womanhood, the major's paternal feelings give way to love. One day he asks his ward to marry him, but because she loves another she is forced to refuse her benefactor.

Later, when the younger suitor comes to ask the major's consent, the old man is inflamed with jealousy at first, but soon the manly bearing of one and the maidenly appeal of the other cause his better feelings to predominate, and forgetting his selfish interest, he joins them with his blessing.

EDISON.

HOW BOBBY JOINED THE CIRCUS (Sept. 23).—Bobby goes to the circus with his father and little sister. We see them go in the side show and watch with them the Snake Charmer, in her den of serpents, and proceed through the menagerie. As they go in the big tent Bobby makes the acquaintance of some of the attaches and talks to them. When he turns around, expecting to see his father and sister, they are nowhere in sight and he realizes that he has become lost from them. Late in the afternoon he gets tired, and lying down in an empty van, takes a rest, thinking perhaps that he can join the show himself. He sleeps soundly, and when they come to load the van at night Bobby is shut up in it.

The next morning when he is discovered, he is getting a little bad treatment when "Big Bill" Haggerty, the boss canvasman, comes along and befriends him. Then Bobby's fun commences. "Big Bill" takes him all around and he sees circus life as it is; stake driving, the blacksmith shop, the cook tent and forming for parade. The performers take a fancy to Bobby and soon he is all made up as a clown.

Father, at home, gets a telegram from "Big Bill" telling him that his son is safe and relieves the family's anxiety as to Bobby's whereabouts.

BENARES AND AGRA, INDIA (Sept. 23).—Benares, "the Holy City of the Hindus," is one of the most ancient cities in the world. Situated on the Ganges it forms a magnificent panorama of buildings in many varieties of Oriental architecture. The banks of the river, lined with stone, are generally crowded with worshippers who come to wash away their sins in the sacred Ganges—a curious and interesting sight. The ghats or bathing places are visited by at least a million pilgrims annually.

We are shown "The Monkey Temple," and are introduced to a number of traveling snake exhibitors. The so-called Monkey Temple is the Durga, sacred to Shiva's wife, who is said to delight in destruction. Agra is a more pretentious place. It contains the Taj Mahal, considered to be the most beautiful building in the world. It was built in 1632 by the Emperor Shah Jahan for the remains of his favorite wife and he himself is buried in it. The building has been described as a "dream in marble" and the picture of it justifies the description.

Situated upon the right bank of the Jumna River, just below a sharp bend, it has a commanding location. The Great Gateway, built in 1648, leads into the beautiful Taj garden. The marble platform on which the great tomb stands is twenty-two feet high and over three hundred feet square. The exquisite white marble minaretes on each corner are one hundred and thirty-seven feet high and the central dome with its metal pinnacle rises to a height of two hundred and seventeen feet. The Taj is a gorgeous array of marble and precious stones. Curious sights are wagons drawn by camels and the extremely crude and ineffective way in which the city streets are sprinkled.

THE LITTLE GIRL NEXT DOOR (Sept. 24).—The little girl next door is a rich little girl, across a court-yard from a modest apartment where dwell two sisters, orphans, one a girl of eighteen, another a child of ten and blind. The latter is by no means unhappy, having learned to read the books for the blind, and she bravely amuses herself all day long while her sister works to support them. The blind child and her more fortunate neighbor, whose father is a widower, become acquainted. They rapidly become intimate, leading to an invitation to the blind girl to accompany the rich child on her summer visit to the country. The older sister feels the separation keenly, but is willing to submit to it on account of the joy it will give the younger.

In the country the two little girls have a great time. One day while crossing a lawn they are startled by a gruff voice and a severe, elderly gentleman orders them roughly off his place. In a moment of panic the little blind girl's companion flees, leaving her alone. The old gentleman is none other than the grandfather of the two orphan girls. Their mother, his daughter, had married against his wishes being then ordered out of his sight forever—a fact which has caused him lifelong bitterness and remorse. The blind child is taken seriously ill, her sister is sent for and when the old gentleman sees her the resemblance to her dead mother is so striking that the whole truth is disclosed at once. Not only are the two girls sure of a good home from now on but there is an indication that the widower and the elder girl are to be much more than ordinary acquaintances.

CYNTHIA'S AGREEMENT (Sept. 25).—An attorney named William H. Woodward, is most unfortunate in the selection of his stenographers, for no sooner do they become competent in his employ, when they resign their positions to be married. This happens so often, to the annoyance of Mr. Woodward, that he decides to draw up an article of agreement with the next stenographer to make sure he will not be left in the lurch again. The agreement reads as follows: "I, the undersigned, agree to work industriously in the capacity of stenographer for William H. Woodward and I further agree not to get married and resign from my position. In testimony whereof we have set our hands and seals duly witnessed, etc."

Among the applicants are several old maids who anxiously seek the position, but shy at signing the agreement, and it is not until Cynthia Temple, a beautiful young girl without love affairs, signs the agreement without hesitation, that Mr. Woodward enjoys peace of mind once more.

Before long Cynthia has become indispensable to Mr. Woodward, who grows very fond of her. Cynthia, however, will not entertain his advances on account of the legalized document bearing her signature. As time rolls on he falls in love and on more than one occasion he regrets the drawing up of the agreement. One day while he is absent from the city an article appears in a newspaper amounting almost to a defamation of Mr. Woodward's character. Cynthia resents this most strenuously, interviews the editor and in a businesslike way convinces him that Mr. Woodward is a man of honor and veracity. The following day the newspaper publishes an article stating that Mr. Woodward was falsely accused and apologizing for the mistake. This comes as a great relief to Mr. Woodward and upon learning that Cynthia defended his character so ably and well, he proposes to her, only to have the agreement again referred to. He becomes desperate, discovers that by one stroke of the pen he is able to change the wording of the agreement to suit the situation and thus hindrance is removed.

MARY IN STAGE LAND (Sept. 27).—The third picture of the "What Happened to Mary" series, takes our interesting little heroine into the glare of the footlights where she gets her first introduction to the trials and pitfalls that beset the path of many girls who become disciples of Thespis. There is the typical manager who finally secures an "angel" (backer) in the person of John Chase, a rich young man about town. Each serves the other's purpose.

Through a kindness done to Daisy, a poverty stricken chorus girl, Mary is engaged as a "show girl" in a musical comedy. During rehearsals Mary hears Daisy in her part so often that she learns it herself and when Daisy is taken ill on the opening night, Mary is given the part and makes a hit. Her fresh young face and unsophisticated ways have not escaped the eye of John Chase, the rich backer of the show, and his pursuit of her is characteristic of this type of human vulture; she is flattered by being kept in the part, even after Daisy's recovery. He is continually by her in the wings, sends her flowers and in a hundred different ways tries the wiles of the man of the world upon the innocent girl. At a banquet which Chase gives to the company Mary is lauded by Chase for having saved the performance. Daisy, influenced by the wine she has drunk, takes this as a personal affront and accuses Mary of stealing her part. Chase, also the worse for wine, condoles with Mary and at last tries to forcibly embrace her, to the amusement of the others. The horror of the situation comes over Mary and she leaves in a burst of indignant wrath. Alone at home she sees two paths open to her—one, the wide, "Primrose Way" of the banquet she has just fled from, the other—the narrow path of honest endeavor. Which does she choose?

'OSTLER JOE (Sept. 28).—Joe, the hostler at the "Magpie," wooed and won fair Annie and through years of cloudless sky a baby crept into their house and grew into childhood. One day down the lane chanced a gentleman to roam, little baby laughed and smiled at him and the child that Joe and Annie had prayed for brought about the mother's sin. 'Ostler Joe came home one night to find the house deserted. Fair Annie had listened to tales of a great city and, forgetting everything, love, honor, child and husband, she had gone with the handsome gentleman who had passed by one day.

Years pased by and Annie rose to fame and glory, but the law of compensation followed out its course. One day Joe read in the paper that the woman he had loved and who had deserted him, was dying in a London garret, destitute, poverty stricken and alone. Death found her locked in those strong arms that had held her as a bride, and whose love had never faltered; a great, strong love that was higher and deeper than sin and a woman's weakness, greater than doubt and hatred and revenge, and so it is that the stone above her grave bears the sacred name of wife.

VITAGRAPH.

BOBBY'S FATHER (Sept. 23).—Dick Ramsay is a "cracksman" and burglar. His wife, Jane, is a good woman and tries to persuade her husband to give up his dishonest ways. They have one child two years old, Bobby. One night before going out on a "job," Dick makes a present to the child of a lucky sixpence with his name engraved on it, hung on a silver chain. Jane does not want the child to have it at first, but Dick declares he has had it made for the child. He then bids them good-bye. A few days later, Jane receives a letter from him saying that he has been caught in the act and sent to prison for a year. She resolves to fly from London which she has grown to hate. She takes her child and a bundle and starts into the country. Worn out with travel and anxiety, she faints on the doorstep of Herbert Ware, a young lawyer, who lives with his only sister. They bring her into the house and get medical attendance. She dies and leaves Bobby, whom the Wares adopt. Six years pass and Bobby grows up in their love and care. Called away to the city on business one night, Herbert tells Bobby he will leave Bessie in his care. Bobby feels brave and important. Wakened in the night by the sound of someone breaking into the house, he goes down to face the intruder. It is Dick, who, having lost all track of his wife and child, has plunged deeper into crime. He meets Bobby, who very seriously, tried to convince him of the error of his ways. Dick's sense of humor is touched and he admires his pluck. Picking the child up in his arms, he sees the old chain and sixpence around his throat and learns he is robbing those who have protected his child. He departs, leaving a note with Bobby to be given to his friends. The next morning Bobby tells of his adventure and is greeted like a little hero, Bessie and Herbert keeping the note a secret and not revealing the identity of Bobby's father.

HIS LORDSHIP, THE VALET (Sept. 24).—In the American Club at London, Jaspar Durbin, a young American, wagers with his friend Richard Schuyler that he can, within three weeks, cross the Atlantic to America without paying his passage. This is how Durbin does it. The Honorable Sir Arthur Courcy, an English Peer, just preparatory to making a trip to America, discharges his valet and advertises for another. Durbin answers the "Ad" and secures the position. Lord Courcy arranges with him to impersonate him on the voyage and he will take his place as the valet, to escape the attention of the title-hunting mammas. On board the steamer, Jaspar Durbin, as Lord Courcy, is the center of attraction and Mrs. Knowlton, a wealthy American, takes special pains to make his acquaintance and introduces her daughter, a very attractive young lady, whose company Durbin very much enjoys. Lord Courcy, as the valet, finds his position very embarrassing when Durbin orders him about and makes him wait on him in the presence of the ladies. Incidentally, he objects, and when Durbin reprimands him for insubordination, he becomes somewhat assertive, which greatly astonishes the ladies, who think him a very strange sort of man-servant. The Lord is unable to stand it longer, and toward the end of the voyage, tells Durbin he must assert himself and declare his identity. A reception is to be held that evening and Durbin is to accompany Harriet Knowlton and her mother. This is thought by Sir Courcy to be a favorable time in which to declare himself to the ladies and also let them know that Jaspar Durbin is only his valet. This affords Durbin an opportunity to declare himself and he makes himself known to Lord Courcy and shows him the written wager with Schuyler. After Sir Courcy's astonishment has subsided, they have a good laugh over the matter, and then agree to appear at the evening reception together, and introduce each other.

Arrayed in evening dress, they attend the reception, much to the surprise of Harriet and her mother, whose surprise is greatly increased when the two men tell exactly who they are. The revelation creates a delightful pleasantness between them all. Harriet readily accepts Durbin's proffered arm, while Mrs. Knowlton is escorted to another part of the room, leaving Harriet and Jaspar to blissful enjoyment of each other's company.

BILL WILSON'S GAL (Sept. 25).—A drunken father like Bill Wilson is a terrible handicap to a girl like Nellie Wilson, who has every ambition and natural qualification of womanhood and character. She is not responsible for her father, yet she is ignored by her more fortunate towns-girls because she is unable to keep up appearances. She struggles bravely on, however, and hopes for the best. She courageously serves notice on Bob Sykes, a saloon-keeper, to prohibit him selling liquor to her father. No attention is paid to her injunction until Bud Grey, a young Eastern lawyer, whose failure in the East has prompted him to come West to make good and establish a practice, Nellie employs him to look after her case and bring suit against Sykes. Bud is attracted by Nellie's personality and determination and takes this, his first client's case, resolved to be successful or know the reason why. He learns that Sykes disregards the order of the Court and finds that he is still serving liquor to Bill Wilson. He awaits his chance and gets him red-handed. A raid is made upon the saloon and Sykes is arrested, brought to trial and convicted.

Bill Wilson, finding that he cannot satisfy the cravings of his appetite, gradually loses his taste for liquor and goes to work, giving his daughter his wages every Saturday night. It is not long before his home takes on a different aspect. Nellie and he soon gain the respect of the community. Nellie, who is honor personified, does not fail to pay her lawyer his fee, which he makes a very modest one, asking as an additional compensation, her hand in marriage. This, she willingly gives him.

Bud Grey is looked upon as the leading lawyer of the County, and when a candidate for Congress is needed, he is asked to accept the nomination. In a well-chosen speech, he consents, closing with the introduction of his wife, Nellie.

THE SIGNAL FIRE (Sept. 26).—After many days of drifting, the Captain of the good ship Martha, finds that he cannot save the vessel which is already a wreck. He will not abandon her, however, but insists that Jack Seymour, his First Officer, take his wife, Mrs. Barnes in the only boat left on the ship and try to save themselves, if possible. After much persuasion, they consent and succeed in reaching a small uninhabited island, where they manage to live until they are rescued by Captain Barnes himself, who had given them up as lost.

After his wife and First Mate leave the vessel, the Captain was obliged to take to a raft and he was picked up by a passing ship. His sufferings caused him to lose his memory, and it did not return until he met an old friend in his home town who showed him a picture of his wife. With his memory restored, he takes charge of another vessel and starts out to sea. While crossing the same latitude as the wreck of the Martha, he sees at a distance, a signal fire. He launches a boat and he and two of his crew follow the signal, reaching the very island where his wife and John Seymour have lived as best they could on sea food and edible herbs. The Captain, when he recognizes his wife, rushes madly to her and she throws herself joyously into his arms. In gratitude, the Captain offers his hand to Seymour for protecting and caring for his wife. He grasps it warmly, but refuses to accompany them to the boat or leave the island, preferring to remain in his loneliness, an exile, for he learned to love and honor the woman, who, in the midst of privation, remained constant to her husband and true to herself.

THE COUNTS (Sept. 27).—The Count whom Mr. Barnes met while abroad, writes that he is in love with his daughter, and wishes to marry her, not to mention her father's millions. He sends with the letter a photograph of himself, which Gladys, who is an artist, endeavors to paint at the Art School studio. The students guy her about the Count. She tells her father, and he takes occasion to reprimand the boys. They determine to play a practical joke on her. They send a telegram to Mr. Barnes, signed by the Count, saying that he has arrived earlier than expected, and requesting Mr. Barnes and Gladys to call on him at the Plaza Hotel, that evening. The students disguise themselves as Counts. When the Barnes call at the Hotel, they are met by a countless army of counts.

They are so chagrined, that they are glad to escape. Gladys has had enough of counts and is quite willing to accept her American sweetheart, whom she really loves. When the real Count arrives, he finds himself left.

WEARY STARTS THINGS IN PUMPKINVILLE (Sept. 27).—"Come out from underneath that wagon, you bum." Weary Willie does so just in time to receive a good, swift kick from the toe of the circus attendant's boot. Reaching the elephant's enclosure, he gives the butt of a cigar to one of them. The enraged beast chases him and soon the whole town is aroused and join in the pursuit.

The local fire department gets busy and tries to capture the escaping animal. Suddenly he turns on his followers and they beat it in the opposite direction. The Sheriff, Weary and a coon climb a tree to get out of his way. The elephant stops to scratch his back against the trunk of the tree and the three men jump on his back. He trots off with them and when he is tired of his burden, he does some lively bucking and throws the three men in three different directions. Finally, the town Sheriff approached the elephant and, finding that he is perfectly harmless, leads him back to the circus. Weary goes with him, hoping to come in for some of the glory. When the town's inhabitants see the elephant walking docilely with the Sheriff and Weary, they are paralyzed with astonishment. The captors take the elephant back to the circus where the Sheriff receives a reward. Weary asks for his and gets it from the elephant, who douses him in a tub of water.

THE IRONY OF FATE (Sept. 28).—Virginia Jameson, a girl of lovely disposition, is wooed by a man much older than herself whom she very much dislikes, but who stands very high in the favor of her parents. She might have married another man had not fate decreed otherwise. She meets and accidentally escapes the man she could have loved and would have married; she stooped to tie her shoe-strings, diverting her attention from him. Had their eyes met, both their lives would have been different.

Leroy Farley, the man favored by her parents, prevails and she marries him. Her life is unhappy, notwithstanding his great riches and social prominence. One day, out for a stroll, she meets some little children, her heart goes out to them as she thinks of the comfort they might be to her were they her own. As she stoops to kiss one of them, Harry Weston, the man whom she could have loved and would have loved her with all his heart, happens by, gazing with admiration on her and the scene before him. As a married woman, she naturally repulses his stare and passes on to her home, where in meditation and loneliness, she thinks of her unsatisfied life and the irony of fate. While she is thus engaged, Harry Weston, in his bachelor apartments, pictures in his revery, life and what it might have been made to him had he married the woman he met and could have loved.

NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER (Sept. 17).—While walking along the rocky seashore with his sweetheart, Charles Fleming, an artist, hears a weird, strange musical sound coming from the water below and pauses to listen. His sweetheart's scarf now blows away and he clambers down to get it. Frightened by his approach Undine, a beautiful mermaid, who has been sunning herself on the rocks, slips out of sight into the waves, but not before Fleming catches sight of her and follows her course through the water with astonishment and admiration. Determined to meet her he returns the next morning and finds her on the rocks. Wooing her with all the fire of his passionate soul he secures her promise to assume a mortal form and wed him. Father Neptune is now summoned from the deep, but warns Undine that if she assumes mortal form she can return to her old life no more. At dawn the artist returns and finds her waiting for him as a beautiful girl. After the marriage the honeymoon in the cottage by the sea begins, but the artist soon tires of her eccentricities and longs for his old sweetheart. One morning, in a fit of passion, he leaves her. Broken-hearted, Undine calls on Father Neptune to take her back into the bosom of the deep. Next morning the artist, regretting his desertion of the beautiful mermaid, is hastening along the shore when he comes upon her dead body cast up by the waves of which she is no longer a part. In a wild burst of grief he sinks down beside her, then slowly the scene fades and Fleming sits up a start as he realizes it has all been a dream.

THE MIXED SAMPLE TRUNKS (Sept. 19).—Howard Missimer and John Steppling, the former a salesman of ladies' suits, and the latter for a large wholesale surgical instrument concern, manage to get their trunks mixed on arriving at the hotel. Now Steppling has a very life-like dummy in his trunk that he demonstrates on for the edification of prospective customers, and it is this dummy that starts all the trouble. After securing his room, Missimer starts to unpack the suits from his trunk, and consequently is horrified on throwing back the lid to see what is apparently the dismembered head, limbs, etc., of a man. With a yell of horror he slams the trunk shut and sinks down at the table, only to be confronted by the headlines in the afternon paper stating a brutal murder has been committed in that very hotel, and that the mutilated body has been found by the police in a trunk. Firmly believing he will be suspected of the crime if discovered, Missimer determines to escape. Meanwhile, Steppling finds he has the wrong trunk, complains to the clerk, and is informed he evidently has Missimer's trunk, as the latter sells ladies' suits. They are about to go to the room when a wild-eyed bellboy dashes in and tells of seeing Missimer doing uncanny things on the floor above. With a cop and a detective the party investigate. Missimer hears them coming and escapes down the fire escape. It is not until after a wild chase that he is captured and the mystery of the trunks explained, then Missimer treats to cigars for the crowd.

THE LOVE TEST (Sept. 20).—Robert Brandt and Lily Leslie, both young people of strong minds and ideas all their own, are informed by an old uncle they must marry each other in order to inherit $500,000. Neither having seen the other they both plan to get out of the matter and, when Brandt calls, Lily assumes the dress of her maid while the real maid plays "Lily." Of course the maid's manners and assumed airs soon sicken Brandt, and he finally makes his escape from the house after having fallen in love at first sight with the real Lily disguised as the "maid." Now Lily has also fallen in love with Brandt, and reads with genuine alarm the note that Brandt has left in order to escape, saying he has suddenly been taken ill and is going home immediately. At the house Brandt finds his chums and disgustedly tells them of his experience. Suddenly they see Lily and the dressed up maid drive up in an auto, and, thinking only to escape further attentions, Brandt stretches out on the bed while his pals whiten his face with powder and strew the sheet with flowers. Then, when Lily enters, they inform her Brandt is dead and blubber profusely in their handkerchiefs. Overcome with grief Lily kneels by the bedside and sobs out: "Oh, Robert, if you had only known! I am Lily Leslie, not the maid!" with which Robert suddenly comes to life in a hurry and Lily promptly faints in the nearest chair. Quickly she is revived and, on making sure Brandt is really alive, confesses the scheme she played and he gathers her in his arms while his pals echo "I told you so!"

ALKALI IKE'S PANTS (Sept. 21).—Coyote Simpson and "Alkali" Ike both love the buxom Soffie, pride of Buckskin, Ariz. Coyote has a long curling mustache that is his one pride and joy, but Soffie objects to it when he kisses her and orders him to trim it down. Prior to this all three of the boys, "Alkali," Mustang and Coyote, have tried to help Soffie with a balk bronco she is driving, and it is not until Mustang mounts the horse in true Western style that things begin to move. Then so fast do they go that the bronco runs itself out of the harness, leaving "Alkali" and Coyote stranded with Soffie miles from home. Later, Coyote proudly shows the boys a fine valentine he has gotten for Soffie, then begins to trim off his mustache. Of course "Alkali" secures a hideous caricature valentine of an old maid with her false teeth and hair off and, with Mustang's help, they substitute it in place of Coyote's perfectly good one. Consequently when Coyote calls on Soffie with his trimmed mustache and valentine she is about to embrace him when she discovers the caricature and drives him from the house under an avalanche of anything she can lay her hands to. A few evenings later "Alkali" has invited Soffie to the town dance, and is industriously ironing his pants in the shack, when the boys discover him through the window and, when he goes to get a hot iron, hook his pants through the window with a stick. Very much negligee, "Alkali" chases around looking for his nether garment, and finally tries to steal a pair from a convenient line, but is loaded with buckshot from the gun of the irate lady of the house. In desperation "Alkali" dons his old chaps, which fail to cover his exposed anatomy, and is leading Sollie proudly into town when he runs across the boys who are holding up his long-lost pants, in the wrangle that ensues "Alkali" is left in the lurch by Sollie who goes on to the dance on the arms of Coyote and Mustang, while "Alkali" wraps his pants about him and strides home cussing everything in general.

ACROSS THE BROAD PACIFIC (Sept. 24).—Beginning with scenes on board a ship, the spectator is transported to Manila and shown the coaling of vessels by the coolies, who do the work by hand. In front of the Binondo Parish Church are seen the rows of beggars asking alms. With views of the Manila water-front and interesting street scenes the spectator begins a tour of Japan. The great cities of Canton, Tokyo and Yokohama reveal many extraordinary natural wonders of customs and industries. In the city of Tokyo we see a reception given at the residence of Mr. A. Asano, and in Yokohama a theater street is gay with the bunting and decorated poles as far as the eye can see. Then we view the Nipa houses along the water-front and are transported across the Pasig river on the ferry. The native city of Shanghai proves a store of interest. In Kobe we view the great bronze Budda of Daibutzu, a gigantic construction that can be seen from a distance of many miles. By boat a trip is made up the picturesque Pearl River to the very gate of the city of Canton, where the Cantonese crowds reveal many strange types. The idle junks mirrored on the placid bosom of the waterways complete a film of unusual interest to all lovers of Far Eastern life

A LITTLE LOUDER, PLEASE! (Sept. 26).—Old Bosworth, who is very deaf, falls madly in love with a charming widow and woos her violently, but the widow declares she cannot marry a deaf man and Bosworth leaves her in a rage. Rushing into the house he finds the widow's nephew making love to Cary and orders him from the house, declaring that the man who marries her will have to be deaf. Later Cary meets John, another suitor, on the street and tells him of her father's declaration. Of course John agrees to pretend deafness in order to win her. Their conversation is overheard by Cal, another suitor, who also pretends to be deaf and calls at the house. Cary introduces her father to both and the old man is delighted at their affliction, but has the time of his life trying to make them hear anything he says. Discovering the ad of Dr. Kurem, who cures deafness, Bosworth calls on the specialist and quickly has his hearing restored with an invisible apparatus that fits in the ear. Greatly delighted, the old man hustles the doctor back to the house to affect the cure of the two imposter suitors. Naturally both of them are filled with alarm when the doctor gets out his instruments, and are undergoing awful tortures when suddenly the widow and her nephew enter and the fake deafness of the two suitors is exposed. In a fine rage old Bosworth kicks them out, wins the consent of the widow to an early marriage and her nephew takes Cary "for better or worse."

THE ADVENTURE OF THE BUTTON (Sept. 25).—Caught in a drenching downpour of rain one day, Hobbs hikes for the nearest store and purchases a raincoat. Arriving home with his purchase he finds that one of the buttons is missing. Meanwhile a crook buys a duplicate of the raincoat at the same store and, that night, enters the place and escapes with the contents of the cash-drawer. The only clue found by the frantic storekeeper is a button torn from the coat as the thief has escaped out the window. Next morning the storekeeper posts a notice in his window with the button, offering a reward for the capture of the thief. Passing the window Mrs. Hobbs sees the advertised button and immediately suspects it to be the one from her husband's raincoat. Meanwhile, the thief who has a room directly above the Hobbs' apartment, also sees the sign, hastens to the house, secretes the money under the bed-mattress, then calls the janitor and makes him a present of the raincoat. Young Sherlock, a would-be detective having been informed of the robbery, catches sight of Hobbs on the street wearing the raincoat with the missing button and attempts to arrest him as he is entering the apartment, but Hobbs takes him for a lunatic. Seeing this from the window, Mrs. Hobbs, fearing for hubby's safety, locks him in a bedroom and has an awful time with a bill collector whom she takes for a sleuth. It is not until the janitor is called in and explains where he got his raincoat that the capture of the real thief is made by Mrs. Hobbs as he tries to leap from the window. Consequently she is handed over the reward and matters end happily after all.

THE VOICE OF CONSCIENCE (Sept. 27).—Frank Craig, a man of wealth starts on a hunting trip with William Sherman, his daughter's sweetheart. Meanwhile, Jack Tenny, an old friend of Craig's, also goes into the woods hunting. One morning, while Sherman is getting water from the brook, Tenny appears at the camp, meets Craig and proudly shows him some game. Borrowing Craig's hunting knife Tenny is preparing the game. Craig suddenly stumbles and, in falling, is mortally wounded by the knife in Tenny's upraised hand. A hasty examination shows that Craig is dead. Wild with terror and fear, Tenny grabs up his gun and rushes from the scene. Reaching the little town he throws the blood-stained knife away and goes to his room. Returning from the brook Sherman finds Craig dead and is vainly trying to restore the spark of life when he is found by the sheriff and arrested as the murderer. Taken to town he is put on trial for his life with circumstances black against him. Tortured by his guilty conscience, Tenny attends each day of the trial at court, and suffers agonies as the attorney for the prosecution weaves the net tighter about Sherman. Morgan, Tenny's roommate, cuts himself while shaving and uses one of Tenny's handkerchiefs to stop the blood. Tenny finds this handkerchief in his room and becomes terror-striken. Morgan also buys a weird drawing, depicting conscience rising from the grave of the victim and appearing before the murderer. This he shows Tenny, not realizing the significance of the thing. Fleeing from the room Tenny bursts into court as Sherman is convicted, gasps out a confession of the affair and dies in the arms of the sheriff, a victim of conscience.

AN INDIAN SUNBEAM (Sept. 28).—The accidental overturning of their "prairie schooner" kills a settler and his wife and leaves their little baby girl, Sunbeam, alone in the world. Discovered by Big Wolf, an Indian brave from a nearby tribe, Sunbeam is adopted and brought up as one of their number. Twelve years later Sunbeam is a beautiful girl and has been told of her parentage by Big Wolf who now loves her. One morning Bob Harris, a cowboy, and his pal are given a drink of water by Sunbeam. Mutual love springs up between she and Harris and she tells him she is not an Indian, but loves them for their goodness. Hiding in the rocks Big Wolf tries to kill the cowboy, but the bullet passes through his hat and he rides on unharmed. Filled with hatred and jealousy Big Wolf resolves that if he cannot have Sunbeam no one else shall win her. Making her a captive in her wigwam that night he ties her to the back of a wild bronco and drives it out upon the plains. In the early gray of morning Bob and his pal are herding the cattle when Bob catches sight of the girl on the bronco's back. Hastening to the corral he secures his lariat and informs the boys who dash out to the rescue. Realizing his plan has failed Big Wolf, who has been hiding nearby, attempts to stab Bob in the back, but is shot dead by one of the cowboys who catches sight of him in time. The bronco is captured and Sunbeam is carried back to the ranch unconscious by Bob. A few weeks later the assembled cowboys give Sunbeam and Harris a rousing send-off as they ride away to be married across the rolling hills.

A GAY TIME IN QUEBEC (Sept. 23).—Fritz and Hans, decide to visit Quebec, Canada. They arrive on the steamer, and as they are coming into the harbor get an excellent view of the quaint old town. They then take a walk on Dufferin Terrace from which they have a fine panoramic view of the lower town. Later they board a trolley car and after passing through the principal business streets and residential section, they arrive at the celebrated Montmorency Falls. Afterwards they visit the Rustic Theater at Montmorency and have a very lively time. Upon their return to Quebec the decide to have a ride on the common vehicle of Quebec, a cart with two wheels known as the Caleche which has been in use there for tourists for years. While riding around in the Caleche, they were attracted by two beautiful young ladies and a flirtation is started. They immediately alight from the Caleche and start after the ladies, forgetting to pay their fares. This, however, is quickly adjusted by a bobby who happens on the scene. They catch up with the girls and as the ladies are kodaking they pose the Germans for a snap shot. But they only pose the unsuspecting Fritz and Hans for a joke and after having a good laugh the girls run off. Fritz and Hans make up their mind that a camera is the one thing essential to make their trip a grand success, so they purchase one. Upon coming out of the store they see the auto fire-engine and think it would be great to have one of them at home. They stop in front of the engine house to take a snap shot, but are quickly ordered away. But a picture they must have, so they decide to send in a false alarm. They find a fire box and send the alarm. The fire engines are seen upon the street. They get their picture, but the police get them.

THE RENEGADES (Sept. 24).—Shortly after the wars in the far west between the Indians and settlers, Jim Carson, a prospector and his pretty wife, settle in a cabin on the mountain side near his claim. Jim has a violent temper which has caused misery to his wife, but the day comes when she can no longer bear his cruelty and she decides to leave him. She packs a few belongings and is about to leave when a thirsty young prospector, in quest of water, stops her at the door. After receiving the filled bottle he asks to escort her safely over the mountains, not knowing why, or whither she is bound. She accepts his offer and they take up the tiresome trail. All would have gone well, had not a band of renegade Indians filled with liquor espied them. The Indians plan to exterminate the little party. The battle for life begins and is heard by Jim Carson who rushes to their aid, not knowing that his wife is one of the party. After a personal encounter with one of the renegades, he finally scatters and defeats them. Then the crash occurs. He discovers his wife whom he believed was home in her cabin. He is about to send a bullet crashing through the brain of the wounded and unconscious prospector, but the pleadings of his wife stays his hand and he decides to give Carson a fair and square chance for life, so he carries him back to his cabin and permits his wife to nurse him back to health. Weeks pass and the young prospector recovers. He is ready to start again on his journey when he is confronted by the irate husband who demands satisfaction. There is no alternative; he must fight a duel or receive an assassin's bullet. He choses the former. The duel is about to be enacted when an Indian shoots and kills Carson from ambush. Turning quickly Collier sees the escaping Indian and shoots him through the heart. The young wife who has followed the men, hoping to prevent the duel, rushes in only to find her husband lying cold on the ground. Like a tigress she springs at the prospector, who finally manages to convince her that he is guiltless. She exonerates him and begs him not to leave her alone. He remains while she kneels and mourns over the untimely end of her husband, fully realizing that once she loved the man, now still in death.

BUSTER AND THE GYPSIES (Sept. 26).—Buster, Henrietta and Brooks are taken to a Church Fair after indulging in cake and ice cream. Buster, our hero, and Brooks, the villian have an altercation over having their hands read by the Gypsies and are taken home. Buster is put to bed and dreams that his hated rival for the hand of the fair Henrietta, steals into her room as she is putting her doll to bed and abducts her. The villain and his henchmen take her to the Gypsies rendezvous, presided over by an old hag. Buster follows and, in peeping through the shutters, alarms the guilty ones who flee with their captive to the camp. Buster follows, and surprises them as they are fighting for Henrietta. He awakens still fighting.

SWIMMING AND LIFE SAVING (Sept. 26).—Guy M. Dailey, ex-champion swimmer of the world, demonstrates the one man method of life saving, and a marvelous exhibition of under water feats. This picture shows a bather overcome by cramps and sinks for the last time. The life saver dives after him, and the drowning man clutches the rescuer in a deathlike grip, which the rescuer easily breaks and succeeds in bringing the drowning person to the surface and swimming to shore, where no other assistance being available, the rescuer brings the rescued one to life, using the one man method of resucitating the drowned. The events that transpire under water are as clearly seen, as are those that take place above the water. In addition to the life saving demonstration, the swimmer shows all of the method of breaking any hold the drowning person might secure upon his rescuer. The swimmer concludes his wonderful feats with an exhibition of eating, sleeping, drinking and smoking under water. A realistic view of a drowning person sinking to the bottom, while the air bubbles, escaping from his mouth, rises to the surface, fish meanwhile playing around his head and through his hair.

pestered with collectors, attempts to end his life by swallowing a pint of liquid glue. As a suicide potion, the glue is a failure, but Billy discovers that it affects his breath, any object that he happens to breath upon instantly adheres. The legs of chairs and tables become fastened to each other. The landlady and the groceryman, collector are easily stuck together. A dago and a policeman are glued. A train is stuck to a pugilist and cannot move. Then he tackles a man-eating tiger and tries to stick him to something, but unfortunately sneezes which counteracts the adhesive power of the glue. The result is disasterous to Billy.

THE WATER WAGON (Sept. 27).—Jerry Gay swears "Never Again" to go on a "bat." When on duty, his friend Moore Jags comes along and in His wife upbraids him for his dissipation. He sists that Jerry just take one. He falls for it and, although he gets back on the water wagon, he has a desire to squirt water on everybody. First a policeman, then a colored couple spooning, a drunk, a crowd listening to a medicine fakir, a Chinaman, etc. Finally the crowd catch him and tie him to a board and fasten him to the back of his own water wagon. All climb aboard and drive many squares, drenching him.

THE DOCTOR'S DEBT (Sept. 28).—Ethel Jordan is the only daughter of the keeper of the White Island Lighthouse. She has two lovers, Harry Myers, the lobster king, and Charles Arthur, another well-to-do young fisherman. Ethel herself is a water nymph and a good swimmer. One summer afternoon, while enjoying a dip in the ocean, near her home, Ethel sees signals of distress displayed from a motor-boat a short distance away. She immediately summons her lover, Harry and both start for the rescue of the motor-boat. The parties in distress prove to be Dr. Richard Morris, an expert city physician, and his young wife. They have run their motor-boat upon a submerged rock and are in imminent danger of sinking. Upon being rescued by Harry and Ethel, the doctor and his wife are profuse in their thanks. The debt of gratitude is not destined to remain long unpaid, for Harry soon after falls ill with diphtheria. Antitoxin and the services of an expert are advised. Charles Arthur, Harry's rival, learns of the situation, and seeing a chance to put a hated rival out of the way, bottles up the inhabitants of the island by disabling their boats. Driven to desperation by the dire distress of her lover, Ethel dons her simple bathing suit and attempts the extremely dangerous swim to the mainland. After a long struggle against wind and waves the girl gains the shore and gets Dr. Morris on the telephone. The doctor is rushed to her aid in a fast automobile. Charles Arthur is again encountered, and is punished for his cowardly act by being forced against his will to aid in saving his rival's life by carrying Ethel and the doctor back to the island at the point of a pistol. The race against death is successful. Dr. Morris' skill enables him to save Harry's life and to reunite the lovers with stronger bonds than ever.

KALEM.

FAT BILL'S WOOING (Sept. 23).—Bill has original ideas of courting but when he puts them into practice he encounters many unexpected obstacles. His heart's desire is Tina but when this young woman spurns his advances, Bill resorts to strategy. After much thought and a great deal of labor he prepares the following note:

"Dear Miss Tina:

I guess you'll be glad to marry me now. My uncle has left me $50,000 and I have gone to get it. Meet me at the station and bring a minister."

Tina takes her friend, Rose, into her confidence and they plan to humiliate Bill when he returns to town. The girls are at the station when Bill arrives but to them he is invisible. The plot proves a dismal failure and our fat friend finds that he is "stung."

ROOST, THE KIDDER (Sept. 23).—Roost Sweet, the well known citizen of Buckton, is a colored gentleman with a well developed sense of humor. He visits Frogtown with his side-partner, Doc. Bird, and traveling through the village they are greeted by a sight which tempts Roost to play one of his practical jokes. Romantic Mandy, swinging in a hammock, reads a fascinating romance and longs for a lover. Roost sends her an anonymous note, signed "Unknown Admirer," in which he offers to serenade the dusky damsel if she will appear at the old oak tree that evening. When Mandy visits the spot and listens to Roost's banjo, a bucket of white-wash is dumped over her shoulders by Bird. Unfortunately for Rost, he QUEEN OF THE KITCHEN (Sept. 25).—Bridget, the cook, objects to the invasion of her sanctum by Mr. Clark, her employer, and the disturbance she causes results in her dismissal. Mr. and Mrs. Clark, expecting guests, attempt to prepare the dinner and make a mess of it. The guests arrive and the distracted Clarks are brought to a realization of Bridget's sterling qualities. The "Queen of the Kitchen" now holds the upper hand and only consents to return when a substantial increase in salary is offered her together with promises of good behavior on the part of her employers.

ALONG THE RIVER NILE (Sept. 25).—No visit to Africa is complete without a trip up this famous river. In this interesting picture we find a party of tourists enraptured by the scenic marvels of the Nile and the many odd sights along the shores. Natives are cutting and loading sugar cane in primitive fashion and the old ferry, which has seen service for hundreds of years, attracts the attention of the travelers. Here are a number of natives, earning three piastres a day by bringing soft coal from the boats and carrying the huge bags on their heads. Arab workmen are removing stone from the ruins of the Temple of Karnak, while others are constructing new masonry. The Arab basket-makers are at work and the palm leaves and stems are formed into many striking designs by the deft fingers. The native boys are carrying dirt and the sand and gravel mill presents an unusual sight.

THE HEART OF JOHN GRIMM (Sept. 27).—A settlement worker visits a tenement home and discovers a motherless child of six. The case is reported to the Tribune Fresh Air Fund and the little girl, with a number of others, is taken into the country.

It happens that the party passes the home of Anna Grimm, a farmer's wife, who is attracted by the child. As the little one places its arms about Anna's neck, the good woman who has recently lost her only child, longs to keep the girl but knows that her stern husband will not approve.

Through some misunderstanding no home is provided for the child and it is brought back to Grimm's house, where a plea is made to adopt the homeless one. The farmer is out in the fields and Anna agrees to take the child.

Anna, fearing John Grimm's temper, hides the little girl in the attic and keeps her presence in the house a secret. Several times Grimm suspects that something unusual is taking place, but each time his suspicions are disarmed.

One day Grimm is sunstruck as he works in the field. The little orphan who has been sent by Anna to gather berries, discovers Grimm's plight. She bathes his head with water until he regains consciousness. As they walk home together, Anna sees them approaching and awaits with fear and trembling her husband's instructions to send the child away. Grimm tells of the timely assistance of the little waif but declares, nevertheless, that they have no room for a child. At this point the orphan kneels down and prays that she may find a home where she may be welcome. The heart of Grimm is touched and he takes the little one to his arms.

THE APACHE RENEGADE (Sept. 28).—Mary Simmons, journeying through the Apache country with her brother's wagon train, meets Jack Lane, a cowboy, who expresses his desire to accompany the party through the Indian lands. Outlaw Bill, a renegade who lives among the Indians, discovers the approaching traders and incites the tribe to attack them.

Mary and Jack become good friends and she presents him with a silk handkerchief which he wears about his neck. While the young man is riding in advance of the wagon train he is captured by the renegade and Indians, who lead him to the camp and rob him of his clothing. Bill attires himself in Jack's clothes and sets forth to join the pioneers, planning to offer his services as guide and thereby conduct the unsuspecting people into the hands of the Indians.

Mary becomes alarmed at the absence of Jack and when the renegade appears she suspects his purpose and warns the pioneers. The girl's suspicions are confirmed when she sees the silk handkerchief which the vanity of the renegade has tempted him to wear.

Outlaw Bill, finding his plot has been discovered, dashes away and induces the Indians to attack at once. In the meantime Jack escapes and brings timely assistance to the besieged wagon train.

MELIES.

A WESTERN COQUETTE (Oct. 3).—Bud bashfully proposes to Mary and is as bashfully accepted, without even a kiss to seal the compact. But he is jubilant, nevertheless, until the arrival at Mary's home of Hamilton, a young business friend of her father's. It is the first Easterener she has ever seen and she becomes interested in him and even haughty over his attentions. When Bud objects to her indifference, Mary becomes indignant and gives back the engagement ring. Bud has asked her to a dance the following week and when the evening comes, she half expects him, in spite of the quarrel. When he does not come promptly she gets peeved and accepts Hamilton's invitation. But Bud is on his way, much the worse for drink, to which the affair has driven him, and when he learns with whom Mary has gone he is furious. He enters the dance hall and is about to tell Mary and Hamilton what he thinks of them when the latter knocks him down unconscious. Mary's sympathy is aroused and her true love for Bud comes back. She nurses him back to consciousness and once more accepts the ring. This time happily—for such is the way with women.

CLEARING LAND FOR FARMING IN THE WEST (Oct. 3).—Interesting views of the removal of the forests of the West to make land productive.

PALS (Sept. 25).—Dan Richards, a good-natured cowboy, is discarded by Gwendoline Parrish and this so breaks his spirit that he packs up and moves to the Mexican border. Evil companions there soon make him a desperate criminal and he is the leader of a band of robbers. With a pal he goes to the American side to make a haul and while in the house he is discovered by a little girl, who runs to tell her mother. The woman enters the room, but stands petrified for she recognizes Dan. Dan, too, recognizes her as Gwendoline, now a widow. He orders his pal not to molest her and retires as graciously as he can. The pal, however, is dissatisfied with the arrangement and kidnaps the little girl from in front of the house. Dan sees him, goes in pursuit and, after a fight, returns with the child. Gwendoline is overjoyed at seeing her child again and it is clearly indicated that Dan will be the protector of both mother and child in the future.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK (Sept. 26).—An excursion through Montana's new national park, situated a few miles west of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, shows natural scenery rivalling that of the famous Yellowstone Park in Wyoming. The park includes many mountains of volcanic origin and the rocks, formed of innumerable strata, are brilliantly colored. The park was opened by the Government less than two years ago and bids fair to become one of America's leading resorts.

THE ANDREU (Sept. 26).—A trio of marvellous young acrobats.

THE FILIBUSTER'S SHIP (Sept. 28).—When the Schoner Sophia sailed on a filibustering expedition with a cargo of gunpowder she had on board a seaman named Carter, a habitual drunkard. Upon learning the nature of the cargo, Carter inflames the minds of the crew. As a result the Skipper must use violence to maintain his authority. Coming upon the Captain unawares (Carter strikes him with a belaying pin and tumbles him into the sea. With the Captain out of the way the sailors begin a drinking bout and in the wild disorder that

THE PRINCESS AND THE MERCHANT (Sept. 24).—This is a famous Arabian fairy tale in which a Princess is loved by two young men, each of whom resorts to various subterfuges in order to vanquish his rival. It is not long, however, until the unwelcome suitor meets his death and the way is made clear for the real lovers to be united.

THE MUSKETEER'S CONSCIENCE (Sept. 27).—A chevalier who is in love with a Vampire comes to financial ruin through her extravagant demands, which culminate with a request for an expensive necklace, the property of a countess. The noble, unable to purchase the jewelry, stoops to robbery. He enters a castle at night and has succeeded in securing the necklace when the countess discovers him. To guarantee his own safety he strangles her. From then on he is haunted by an apparition and, fleeing from it, he toppled through a window and is killed.

BIOGRAPH.

FRIENDS (Sept. 23).—At the mining-camp of Golden Creek, the little orphan girl of the late proprietor of Golden Creek Inn is the pet of all the miners. Her father had long been their great friend and adviser, and hence his little daughter always commanded their greatest respect. She becomes greatly infatuated with Dandy Jack, who is considered by all as her sweetheart. Jack decides to leave the camp for other diggings, and the little one is almost heartbroken. As he is leaving, he meets Bob, his old chum, who has just arrived at the camp. Their greeting shows clearly the value of that little word "friends." Later on, Bob comes to the Inn and falls deeply in love with the little orphan, who has realized by this time that her feeling for Jack was infatuation rather than love. Hence she and Bob are engaged to be married. Shortly before the day set for the wedding, Jack returns and is twitted by the boys about the apparently fickle girl, whereupon he wagers that he can win her back, not knowing, of course, who the successful suitor is. The outcome is a revelation to all.

A DISAPPOINTED MAMMA (Sept. 26).—Mamma takes her daughter to the seashore where she hopes to catch a titled husband for her. The daughter, however, does not enthuse over the idea of being a countess or a duchess, anticipating a happier future as the wife of a suitor of her own choice. Mamma, in her anxiety to capture a titled son-in-law, is about to marry her daughter to an adventurer posing as a count, whose designs are thwarted by a traveling salesman.

A MIXED AFFAIR (Sept. 26).—As Jenkins leaves for his office in the morning, his wife asks him to stop at the dentist's on his way home for her new set of teeth. It happens to be his stenographer's birthday, so after he leaves the dentist's he stops at a jeweler's to buy a jewel belt buckle as a birthday present. While making the purchase, a policeman enters to buy a bracelet for his sweetheart. The packages in which the three articles are packed are very similar and a general mix-up occurs.

GAUMONT.

THE HEART OF THE RED MAN (Sept. 24).—The stubborn warlike Sitting Bear disproves of his daughter Fire-Fly's match with a young brave, by the name of Ardent Heart, with whom she is in love. He refuses her the pleasure of the latter's company, until he realizes that her passion is too strong, whereupon he seeks to profit by it. He demands a herd of cattle from Ardent-Heart for the hand of his daughter and the lover starts immediately to procure the necessary dower. To do this he raids a herd of Hassapaws' cattle. This furious tribe resents the theft and captures the plunderer. They decide to torture him in the form of running the gauntlet, and he is to be granted his liberty if he succeeds in escaping their bullets. While being forced through their line-up, the valiant red-man plunges through their column amidst the continuous fire from their guns. He is wounded, but succeeds in making his escape across a broad lake.

Fire Fly has heard the discharge of the weapons and fearful for her lover, has hurried to the shore. Here she meets the valiant warrior and takes him to her father Sitting-Bear. The latter is pleased at the courage of his warrior and therefore consents to his union with the pretty Fire-Fly.

THE STOLEN CUB (Sept. 26).—Jimmie Logan, a Canadian Government official, while hunting in the forest one day comes upon an unguarded cub, during the absence of the mother bear, and brings the little animal home to make a pet out of it. Jimmie's family is delighted with the cub and give it every consideration they possibly can. This, however, is no balm to the torn heart of the mother bear, who seeks her young one high and low, until she finally tracks it to the cottage of the Canadian pioneer. Here she paws and scratches at the door in hopes that the fury of her outcry will intimidate the Canadian Government agent into restoring her offspring. However, the noise of wild animals is so common around this forest hut that the poor bear attracts no attention.

The next day Jimmie is summoned by the sheriff of the locality to call for the wages of his assistants. On his way back he imprudently displays the contents of his pocketbook at one of the roadway saloons. Two robbers eye the amount thus exhibited, with serious intent and hurry on and conceal themselves in the underbrush so as to ambush Logan on his way back. This they do and beat him to an almost unrecognizable pulp and make away with his money. Jimmie's prolonged and unusual absence is a source of great worry to his wife, who passes the night in the utmost disquietude. One of her children bears a knock at the door and asks his mother to open it to let the father in. The mother turns the knob but instead of seeing her husband outside, a huge bear walks in.

At daybreak Jimmie regains consciousness and drags himself toward his cottage. He finally pulls himself to the rear door of his house, where he discovers a large female bear pawing at the door knob. In his anxiety he fails to think of the agony the bear is undergoing, deprived as she is of her cub, takes careful aim and kills her. His wife attracted by the shot rushes out. Needless to say Jimmie and his whole family are sorely grieved at the death of the faithful bear.

AMERICAN.

GERONIMO'S LAST RAID (In two reels) (Sept. 12).—Lieutenant Parker reports for duty to Major Wilkins, Commanding Ft. Sill, where Geronimo is a prisoner. Parker quickly wins the love of Pauline, the major's daughter, and the undying hatred of Capt. Gray. The captain plans to release Geronimo in the dead of night, throwing the blame on Parker. This he successfully does by obtaining, through an accident in the billiard room, possession of a letter from an Eastern friend to Lieutenant Parker. By tearing out a portion of this letter reading, "of course Geronimo's escape would mean an advantage to you," he successfully deceives everyone. But meantime Parker has been hurriedly detailed to find Geronimo; so Gray is sent out with a second detachment to overtake both Geronimo and Parker and make them both prisoners.

Through a friendly orderly, Pauline learns of the trick. She hastens after Parker to warn him but falls into Geronimo's clutches. The lieutenant is himself captured by Geronimo and, with Pauline, makes his escape.

Later, he rescues Captain Gray and his command from certain death, and is rewarded by being made prisoner by Captain Gray. But all is explained at the formal court-martial, when Pauline rushes in with the other portion of the letter. That paragraph completed reads—"of course Geronimo's escape would mean an advantage to you young fellows fresh from West Point, by giving you a chance to recapture Geronimo and show your mettle. Good luck, old boy. From your old friend, Jim Random."

THE FEAR (Sept. 16).—Old Jim Struthers, with his daughter, Mabel, was a seaman. No one knew how old Jim and his younger partner, Bob, made their living, although there was much talk of smuggling. Things moved easily in the little cabin by the sea until Bob began to cast amorous eyes toward the pretty Mabel. Then trouble came, for Mabel detested Bob with all her heart.

One day a party of cowboys gamboled down to the ocean-side. They spent the day in playing along the shore and compelling their horses to swim through the heavy surf. Mabel watched them. Ralph Hapwood, boss cowboy, met her. Love sprang up between them instantly and in the frequent trips that followed, love grew apace. Bob noticed it and resented the handsome stranger's coming deeply. He told Mabel's father that the cowboy was a secret service man ready to nab them. So old man Struthers prepared to kill Ralph. This he found hard to do for in spite of himself he liked the face and clear blue eyes of the ranchman. One day Ralph found the cache in which much contraband goods were stored. He went promptly to Struthers and while talking with him in the doorway, did not see the ready aim of Bob's revolver from behind the corner of the building. Neither did Bob see the cowboy, off at a distance, suddenly drop his cigarette draw his gun and fire. The result was a sudden yell from Bob and much happiness among the occupants of the little cabin by the sea.

WUN LUNG'S STRATEGY (Sept. 18).—Colorado Joe obtained work on the William's ranch. About that time old Bob Williams with his son Jim, went to the local banker, Hawkins, to negotiate a further loan on his ranch. A stormy interview followed, during which the son Jim and Clarice Hawkins, daughter of the banker, made love in the woods close by. Williams was refused the loan but at the urgent request of his son Jim, finally decided to pay off the mortgage.

Colorado Joe heard it all through an open window and wrote to his pal Ike to meet him and secure the fourteen thousand which Williams carried to Hawkins. He went later to get his answer and received a brief note from Ike reading, "We'll get that fourteen thousand Friday, three o'clock closing time." Tucking the note in his shirt, Colorado Joe sauntered down Main street, meeting Clarice. He attempted to kiss her when Jim knocked him sprawling into a mammoth mud-puddle. Getting out of this in no gentle mood, Colorado Joe strolled into Wun Lung's laundry and at the point of his gun, requested Wun Lung to clean the shirt and do it quick. Wun Lung did, but in turning the shirt over, found the note from Ike, and, in panic, stuck it into the package nearest at hand. Joe took his shirt and went his way.

Clarice called shortly after and found the note in her bundle. It was then Friday and 2:30 P. M. Knowing it was useless to go back to the bank, she mounted her horse and began a mad gallop to the Williams ranch. She arrived at 2:45 P. M. and galloped off again followed by the entire ranch. In the nick of time, the posse surrounded the bank, secreting themselves in and about the building. Joe and Ike arrived at exactly three o'clock and were met royally. Then Jim found a more willing prospective father-in-law in the banker Hawkins.

"101" BISON.

(N. Y. M. P. Co.)

A FRONTIER CHILD (Sept. 13).—John Adams is a pioneer, living in a log cabin with his wife and baby girl. He digs a bear pit. A big black bear falls crashing into it. An Indian comes upon the captured animal and shoots it and secures the skin.

Adams meets him with the bear-skin on his arm and attempts to take the hide away. The Indian draws a knife, and a fierce encounter takes place, in which Adams lands a crushing blow on the Indian's jaw, knocking him down. As Adams walks away the Indian regains his feet, and fires at the trapper. As the report rings out and the bullet sings past his head, Adams drops to the ground and feigns death. The Indian runs up and leans over him and is clutched by the throat by Adams, who leaps to his feet. The Indian is badly wounded and Adams departs. The redskin happens to be the chief's son, and when he is found by his tribe their rage is unbounded. A war dance is held, and they decide to retaliate by an attack upon the whites.

Mrs. Brown, a neighbor, is taken ill, and her husband drives over and gets Mrs. Adams to minister to her. She leaves baby Dot alone. The Indians finally reach the Adams cabin. Dot leaps into the huge bucket at the well and descends to the bottom.

The Indians sack the cabin and are about to depart when they spy Adams coming home. Quickly hiding, they await his approach, and, leaping upon him he is overpowered and carried away. The cabin is set on fire.

Dot comes from her hiding place, and with water from the well manages to extinguish the blaze. She then barricades the door, and tremblingly awaits—she knows not what. Coming home in Brown's rig, Mrs. Adams sees the Indians galloping toward her from the vicinity of her home. Brown wheels the horse around, but her mother instinct is aroused to the highest pitch and she refuses to go on. Brown then resolves upon a desperate measure, and secreting Mrs. Adams in the bushes he drives out into the open and plies the whip to his horse, drawing the pursuit of the Indians.

Mrs. Adams races home and hammers at the door. Dot, thinking it is the Indians, lifts a heavy gun across the back of a chair and is about to pull the trigger when her heart fails her, and she turns away and hides in the fire-place. Mrs. Adams calls to her, and at the sound of her voice the little girl springs to the door with a glad cry and unlatches it.

In the meantime Adams has been securely bound and placed in a tepee to await torture, with a guard in front. Straining at his bonds he finds he cannot undo them, and shaking himself forward he manages to drop a few matches out of his shirt pocket. Working with his hands behind him he gathers up twigs and leaves, and scratching the match with his mouth he sets the mass on fire. He turns over and holds his hands into this fire, burning off the cords, and is free.

Hundreds of emigrants and settlers seek the protection of the fort. The gates are scarcely closed behind them when the Indians attack. A sensational and thrilling battle takes place in which the soldiers and emigrants are being defeated when they resolve upon a desperate course. A huge bomb is made of a keg of powder, and as the Indians gather to rush upon the weakened gate it is thrown into their midst, blowing them to atoms. With a wild rush the whites rush from the stockade and attack the bewildered Indians, and the few surviving redskins are killed or driven off.

Adams throttles his guard and escapes. He is rent with conflicting emotions, but entertains a forlorn hope that his family may have escaped. Running to the door he calls to his wife, and his heart leaps with joy when she replies, and with Dot rushes into his arms.

THE RANCHMAN'S AWAKENING (Sept. 17).—John Blake, a farmer, has by dint of hard work arrived at that stage when he feels that he can support a wife. He marries an Eastern girl. John brings her to the farm house, where she is well received by the boys.

Cynthia finds that farm life is not all fresh air and rambles, and she works hard and faithfully. John takes but little rest and the result is that he falls sick and is unable to resume his labors unless he takes a rest and a change from the altitude. Cynthia bravely persuades him to go and offers to keep things going during his absence.

Cynthia advertises for summer boarders with good results, but the endless work tells upon her and for the first time in her life she gets listless and does not find time to dress carefully.

John returns, well and strong. He does not notice that his wife has had enough of drudgery and finds the well dressed boarders to his liking. He neglects his wife and falls into the skilfully spun web of the cheerful widow, who admires his health and strength.

Cynthia wilts under his neglect, but works on. A dance is held and Cynthia refuses to attend—she has too much work to do—but Mrs. Brown, one of the boarders and a woman of the world who has watched proceedings carefully, comes to her room and insists upon her dressing in some of her clothes and joining the others. Mrs. Brown does her hair in the latest style and fusses her up so that when John next sees her he sees a very beautiful young woman. He is ashamed of himself and endeavors to pay her attention, but acting upon Mrs. Brown's orders she neglects him and devotes herself to the men around her. The ordeal is too much for her strength and she faints. John, altogether cured, carries her to her room and shows his sincere penitence. He asks the boarders to go, gets snubbed by the widow and refusing to let Cynthia work as of yore makes up for past mistakes by setting out to make her thoroughly happy. He succeeds.

THANHOUSER.

AT THE FOOT OF THE LADDER (Sept. 22).—She was a sweet, charming girl, and always obeyed her dear papa and her mamma. But finally a crisis arose, and what could the poor girl do? Here is the problem she had to solve: Dear papa told her that he wanted her to marry his junior partner a "perfectly delightful" lawyer. Mamma at the same time trotted out a candidate who was a member of one of our first families, and could lead a cotillion beautifully. Mamma said pa's candidate was "an old fogy." Pa called the society men, "a dude with one-half the brains of a mud hen." If she married either one she was sure to mortally offend one of her parents, so she went out on the front steps and wept bitterly.

In the midst of her grief, a young newspaper man she knew happened along, and being a good newspaper man, inquired the particulars. She confided in him, and he told her how to solve the problem.

"Don't marry either of them," he said, "marry me. Then each of your parents will be so pleased that the other was fooled that they will forgive you."

The girl, in the meantime had agreed to elope with both of the other men, to oblige pa, in one case, to make ma happy in the other. The reporter convinced her that his suggestion was the best but she did not know how to get rid of her other suitors, who were due to help her down a ladder that night.

The reporter solved the puzzle. He called in a policeman pal, and had the suitors arrested as burglar suspects. Then he eloped with the girl, quietly, visited her parents, calmly and was forgiven without any fuss whatsoever, just as he had expected.

UNDINE (Part One) (Sept. 24).—In the days long ago when knights were brave and venturesome, lived Lord Huldbrand of Ringstetten. The Duke's daughter, Bertalda, Huldbrand's kinswoman was the most famous beauty in that section, and Lord Huldbrand was one of the cavaliers who vainly sought to win favor in her eyes. Just beyond the Duke's domains was a gloomy stretch of woods, known as the enchanted forest. It was said to be the resort of all kinds of spirits and goblins, and travelers durst not venture there.

The haughty Lady Bertalda was struck with the idea that here was a way to prove her power over her admirers. To the one who would dare to make a midnight trip through the enchanted forest, she offered a bow of ribbon, fashioned by her own fair hands, which did not seem much of a prize, except to the infatuated young men. At that, however, Huldbrand was the only one who dared to tempt fate. Bravely he rode through the forest, pestered and annoyed by spirits, until at last, faint and exhausted, he saw the humble cottage of a fisherman, and gladly sought refuge there.

The fisherman and his wife, both past middle age, were common peasants, but the girl with them, whom at first he thought was their daughter, was of entirely different class. She was young, beautiful and refined, and the Knight lost his heart to her at once. The peasants told him that they knew nothing about the girl except that they believed she had been shipwrecked, and seemingly half drowned she had arrived at their humble home.

Lord Huldbrand's love became more and more pronounced, and in a very short time he asked her to be his bride. Then she told him her story.

"Many a fisherman," she said, "has had a passing glimpse of some fair water nymph, rising out of the sea with her song; he would then spread the report, and these wonderful beings became to be called Undines. And you now see before you, my love, an undine."

She then went on to explain that undines have no souls, and only by marriage with human beings could they acquire them. Undine determined to be of this number, and made her appearance as an earth maiden. Other spirites had aided her, and Lord Huldbrand had practically been driven by them through the enchanted forest to the fisherman's cottage.

The Knight's love conquered, and he embraced the beautiful Undine, telling her that she should be his bride and that nothing else mattered. They were married, and returned through the forest together. To the surprise of the Haughty Bertalda, Lord Huldbrand returned to announce that he had fulfilled his quest, but he returned the Lady her token, saying that by his trip to the enchanted forest he had won the fairest of brides. Then the nobleman and Undine proceeded to the castle, where they hoped to live together, forever.

Part Two.—Many years ago, Lord Huldbrand lived in his castle on the Danube River with his beautiful bride. He knew that before his marriage she had been a water nymph, because she had confessed the fact to him, but her marriage to a man of the earth gave her a soul, and she was so sweet and charming that he tried to forget the fact. From time to time, however, it was brought back to his attention by the unexpected appearance of some of her relatives, notably one Huhlborn, an uncle who in repose was a most charming brook, but ever and anon would resolve himself into a tall, old man, who seemed full of curiosity as to how his niece was faring. It palled upon Huldbrand, and he often wished that his bride had had earthly kinsmen.

Matters came to a crisis when Huldbrand's kinswoman, the charming Lady Bertalda, arrived with her father to pay Hulbrand a visit. There had been a time when Bertalda regarded Huldbrand as her chosen knight, but when she sent him into the Enchanted Forest he met Undine and forgot every one else. So Bertalda hated Undine, although she hid her feelings under a mask of friendship.

Huldbrand, again fell under the spell of Bertalda. He neglected his beautiful wife, and her to, were noted by the water nymphs, who determined to avenge her. Their chance came when Huldbrand and the two women were taking a trip on the water. The nobleman had been more than usually attentive to Bertalda and neither of them noticed that in the water surrounding their boat, were scores of hands stretched out to drag them to destruction. Undine saw them, however, and after trying vainly to induce the nymphs to depart, she sacrificed herself to save her husband, leaping overboard and sinking, supposedly to death, under the sea.

Huldbrand's mourning was brief, and soon his bethrothal to the beautiful Bertalda was announced. The latter was of a vengeful disposition, and remembered that the only time Huldbrand had upheld his wife was once when she wanted a fountain in the courtyard blocked up, and the nobleman permitted it to be done, despite the protests of Bertalda. Now the young woman, in her husband's absence, had the obstructions removed, and laughed as she thought that she had removed the last vestiege of her former rival.

The unhappy Bertalda did not know that the fountain was the only road by which the sea nymphs could get into the castle. Undine had closed the door to save her husband. Bertalda opened the way again, and through the fountain came a woman in white, weeping bitterly. Spectators drew aside in awe as she entered the banquetting room, and approached the bridegroom. They recognized Undine as she stepped to the side of Huldbrand and enfolded him in an embrace—the embrace of his death, for he fell dead at her feet.

At the funeral of the unhappy knight, there was one mourner who followed the others alone, and remained after they left. It was the faithful Undine. She fell on her knees beside the tomb, her arms encircling the body. Then she faded from human sight, and a bright silvery brook appeared, and is there to this day. From that time forth villagers are said to have shown travelers this spring, and they believe it is to be the poor forsaken Undine, who continued this to twine her arms around her beloved Lord.

AND THE GREATEST OF THESE IS CHARITY (Sept. 27).—The rich banker did not realize how differently he and his daughter looked at life until the girl returned from a convent school where she had passed many years. The banker's motto was "Everyone for himself, and me first." The girl believed in aiding the poor, and that wealth carried with it an obligation to be useful.

The father admired his beautiful daughter, even though he did not understand her. She loved him and hoped some day to bring him to a realization of his duty toward the helpless and friendless. Before this happened, the clash came.

Returning to his home one day, the banker was surprised to hear chatting and laughter in his dining room. Investigating he discovered that his daughter had brought "some of those beggar brats" home. He was enraged that his house should be so polluted, and sternly ordered the girl to throw her guests out immediately. Vainly she pleaded with him, and finally declared that if the others went, she would go too. The man did not believe she meant it, and jeeringly told her to try it. She bowed, and, followed by her humble guests, left the house.

The girl went with them to their tenement home, and having no money with her, gave one of the poorest of the party a jeweled bracelet which her father had presented to her. Then, weary of the world, she sought refuge in a convent, found peace, and was soon happy as a teacher in a little parish school in the slums of the city.

The father in the meantime, believed his daughter was dead, for the bracelet was found on the charred remains of a woman, burned to death in a fire in the slums. Rich, but lonely and heart-sick, the banker took a vow to do good where he had done harm, and soon became better known for his kindliness and charity than he had been for his business ability. He believed his daughter dead, and she, knowing that no search had ever been made for her, supposed that he had closed his heart against her.

Among the banker's new proteges was a little girl, who reminded him of his daughter when the later was a child. At her invitation he accompanied her on one occasion to the parish school she attended, and there to his surprise and joy, met the daughter he thought was dead. There was mutual explanations and mutual forgiveness. The banker thanked Heaven for the happiness that had again entered his life, and to show his gratitude in a practical way, decided to endow a school, for it was a school and a tiny scholar that had brought him back to his daughter.

The dedication services were graced by the presence of Cardinal Farley, and the building now stands as a memorial aid constant reminder that a father, who had lost the daughter he loved, regained her after many days, and through the charity he had once sneered at as something that should not exist.

SOLAX.

THE LOVE OF THE FLAG (Sept 25).—A very efficient draughtsman in the employ of the government, quarrels with the head draughtsman in his department. The head draughtsman makes it very unpleasant for his subordinate. Their relations become so strained that it becomes necessary for the government to discharge the younger of the two men. The young draughtsman is very much incensed against the government. He is out of work for a long time, and his family becomes destitute. His wife is forced to take in work she is not accustomed to, and many a day their child is put to bed with very little to eat.

Because of their close proximity to the barracks, the child is very much interested in soldiers and is naturally very patriotic. George Washington is a god to the child and the country he built represents paradise to him. The father in his wanderings looking for work, meets an agent for a foreign government, who offers him a big sum for duplicates of the plans of certain fortifications on the Pacific coast. The draughtsman tells his wife about it and she advises him to go to the government and try to get a hearing. He is discouraged in his attempts by repeated repulses and temporizing methods of certain authorities.

Finally the draughtsman grows desperate and decides to accept the proposition made him by the foreign spy. The patriotic son of the draughtsman saves his father from treason and disgrace by unique and timely interference.

THE FUGITIVE (Sept. 27).—During a struggle with desperadoes, Helen's mother is killed by a stray bullet. The ground upon which her mother fell Helen consecrates and makes holy by planting a flower bed. One day while caring for his sanctified place a stranger comes on the scene, exhausted and solicitous. Helen offers him a temporary shelter. So long had she spent her time alone that she is thankful for the companionship of someone her age. Immediately after she had sheltered the stranger, her father, who is the sheriff of the county, rides in and asks Helen if she had seen anyone come by—that a prisoner had escaped from the jail.

Helen does not tell her father about the stranger she is harboring. When her father leaves she takes the fugitive to a shack near the house and rigs up comfortable quarters for him. For several days Helen spends many delightful hours with her "hero." She brings him food and clothes every day. One day the suspicions of her father are aroused when he sees his daughter carrying a basket of food out of the house. He follows and learns of the existence of the fugitive. The fugitive tries to make his escape. The sheriff fires and the fugitive drops on the consecrated grave of the sheriff's wife.

Helen, seeing again a tragedy similar to the one enacted some years ago when her mother was killed on the same spot, is crazed by the coincident. The fugitive, however, is only wounded and is taken back to the prison. Helen, however, is of the opinion that he had been killed.

Her reason lost, she makes regular trips to the shack as had been her custom—and always she carries with her a basket of food. The father is heartbroken. Helen walks about as if in a dream. She broods and imagines that "her fugitive" is about and that she can see him and that he talks to her.

In desperation the father calls in a doctor. The doctor, after a close observation of his patient, recommends a very extraordinary cure and the girl is brought back to reason.

THE GERANIUM (Sept. 25).—A little girl is left an orphan by the death of her widowed mother, and has but one thing left to brighten her life—a geranium plant. Dan Bossworth, a young lawyer, in passing her poverty-stricken home saves the geranium when it is blown from the window-sill and, discovering the elem of death on the door-bell, learns of the child's condition and arranges to adopt her. He takes her to his boarding-house and makes her happiness his life's ambition. Later when she becomes a beautiful young woman he reaches the pinnacle of success in his profession and, going home to her, tells her they will change their social sphere to fit his new duties. She, however, tells him she is going to work and will no longer be dependent upon him. Realizing he loves her he pleads with her to become his wife. She laughs it off and afterward when the attentions of a guilded youth are showered upon her he warns her of her danger and they quarrel. Broken-hearted, he goes to his lonely office, while she goes out with the other man. Compelled to resist his unworthy advance she realizes the character of the guilded youth and the worth of her former protector. Rushing away from him she goes to Dan's office and, kneeling down beside him, begs his forgiveness and sobs out her love for him.

THE CUCKOO CLOCK (Sept. 28).—An old fisherman and his wife have been saving up their pennies for a long time to buy a cuckoo clock. The day the savings reach the needed amount the old man does not go to work, but with his wife makes the occasion a gala one. He goes to town, secures the clock and tenderly and gently carries it home, telling his friends on the way what a wonderful addition it will be to his cottage.

Arriving home he finds his wife has spent a great deal of time arranging a place for the clock in the living room. Very carefully it is dusted, wound, and secured in place and they are as happy as two children when the cuckoo calls the hour. Later, while he is on the beach and she is in the village, a young sailor hearing the cuckoo as he is passing, climbs in and examines the clock. He breaks it and runs away. She returns to find the clock a wreck and tries to mend it, but fails. The old fisherman accuses her of breaking it and her denial brings about a quarrel. He, thinking her untruthful after all the years they have spent together as man and wife, leaves her. The boy returns from a cruise and, overhearing her endeavor to get him away from the grog shop, learns the cause and rights the wrong. The old folks become reconciled and the family discord is forever thrown out of the cottage along with the family clock.

ITALA.

THE SOLEMN HOUR (Sept. 8).—Benton, the warden of a prison, learns that a man named Lawrence has purchased the residence next to his. Twenty years before Benton had made a proposal of marriage to Lawrence's cousin, and the interference of Lawrence had caused the young lady to reject him. Benton, a revengeful man, had treasured a grudge against Lawrence all these years, but conceals his real feelings under a mask of friendship and geniality.

The new neighbor has an idolized daughter named Lucile. A young convict seeing her pass the prison becomes wildly enamored of her, and in the solitude of his cell composes verses to her beauty.

Benton looks up the man's record and finds he is Louis Benton, No. 250, sentenced to thirty years' imprisonment, parents unknown. A wild idea of revenge seizes him and he determines to make the young man the instrument of his revenge.

He enters Louis' cell and convinces the young man that he is his father, and that he will help him escape. The warden arranges everything and Louis easily gets away and remains in a nearby town until he receives word from Benton to come back.

Benton provides Louis with a fine wardrobe and introduces him to the Lawrence family as his son who has been abroad. He does all in his power to throw the young people together, and Louis presses his suit so ardently that Lucile finally promises to marry him.

The wedding night arrives. Louis is madly in love with Lucile and is filled with remorse for having concealed his past from her. Before the ceremony he goes to Benton and asks his permission to tell her everything. Thoroughly angry, Benton throws aside his mask, and a sensational scene takes place, in which Benton tells the young man to choose between obedience and re-imprisonment. Louis promises silence and the wedding takes place.

The guests depart. The bride goes upstairs to her room. Benton and Lawrence are in the library and Louis bids them goodnight and goes to join his bride. As he beholds the trusting girl he is overwhelmed with his duplicity and confesses. The girl recoils from him in horror. Maddened with the turn of events, Louis leaps over a balustrade and comes crashing to the floor below.

Benton has awaited like a cat with a mouse to deal his revengeful thrust to Lawrence. He has just told Lucile's father that his daughter is married to an assassin, when a crash is heard which brings the entire household to Louis' crushed form. His head is raised from the tiles, and with his dying breath Louis denounces the warden, who slinks away.

CHAMPION.

DUMMY DIRECTOR (Sept. 16).—Alice Denby has secured a position as stenographer in the office of John Sebastian, a broker and big financier, for whom her father is working. Alice appeals to Sebastian. At first she resents openly his marked attentions, but threatening her with the dismissal of her father from service, Sebastian forces her to listen and heed his requests. Finding herself deeper in the meshes of his power than she had realized, she confesses to her father. Enraged and heartbroken, the father realizes his helplessness to cope with the situation, as he is as much in the power of Sebastian as the rest of those associated with him.

With the advent of the forming of a big merger involving millions, old Denby sees his chance to materially avenge himself for Sebastian's outrageous treatment of Alice.

As has always been the case in past mergers, old Denby is called into the meeting of the Board of Directors of the new combine and is formally presented with a large block of stock, enough to give him full control of the organization. This is as it always has been: Denby the largest stockholder and a director in the combine. Should any grave difficulty arise that would involve them in any criminal suit, Denby would stand the brunt of the blow. Always the obedient servant, Denby accepted the stock and the risk. The risk was his, but the stock in reality never was.

But this time Denby realized the power in his hands with the possession of the certificate acknowledging his ownership of the majority of shares. He assigns the stock over to his daughter. Armed with this power, Alice goes to the meeting of the Board of Directors and forces Sebastian to materially make amends for the wrong he has done her.

POWERS.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A WIDOW (Sept. 18).—The girls and boys of Byrn Mawr Academy arrange a camping party. The selection of a desirable chaperone is left to Dave, who unfortunately selects the college widow.

The arrival of the widow at the station is the instant cause of trouble and the girls refuse to go, and leave in a huff. Explanations to the widow are of no avail; she snubs the boys and leaves them disconsolate. The girls, to show their independence, leave for a "No Men Wanted" camp, chaperoned by Miss Prim. The boys learning their destination, follow and set up a rival camp. War is declared between the rival camps. How the plans of the boys to take the girl's camp by storm was frustrated by the girls, forms a highly interesting and humorous story.

FATE'S WAY (Sept. 20).—A young man marries Fritzi, who is a very poor housekeeper. He has to get his own breakfast, etc., as her only ambition seems to be to take care of her poodle dog. She neglects her husband and gives card parties, etc., to people who are not welcome nor agreeable to him. On a visit to the country, he discovers Florence Barker, a country girl, and falls in love with her, but realizing that he cannot marry her, tells her his plight and asks his wife for a divorce, which she refuses.

Years later his wife dies and for old times' sake he goes back to the village in which he met Florence. As he walks down the street intending to pass the home which she occupied years before, he sees a kindly old lady coming from the opposite direction. This old lady proves to be his sweetheart of yore, and there is a happy reconciliation.

THE MILLIONAIRE COP (Sept. 16).—Jack Gardner, son of Justin Gardner, has been reared in luxury, but his mind was not run to business—his great ambition is to be a politician, at which his father rebels. Jack has to associate with all sorts and condtions of mankind to gain the coveted goal of being nominated for assemblyman in his district. The ward boss and others of like calibre call on him at his father's house and the father is so enraged that he refuses to help Jack to meet the expenses of his campaign. Jack goes to his political club, meets the boss, tells him of his father's ultimatum. The club refuses to provide the money necessary, so Jack leaves. Not wishing to return home, and wishing to in some manner bring his father over, he evolves a scheme with the boss to humble his father's pride a bit. He joins the motorcycle police, which almost drives his father crazy. The father, a widower, has fallen in love with a charming widow and the father has not told her of his son. In the course of duty, Jack stops a runaway horse and carriage, saving the widow's life. She is most grateful, but does not know nor does Jack reveal his identity. The widow 'phones to Justin Gardner, telling him of her accident, and he fearful of the consequences hurries in his auto toward the widow's home. As he is speeding his son Jack arrests him, hustles him to the station, where he in spite of angry protestations, is compelled to pay a fine. He calls on the widow, finds her smiling and happy and on the spot proposes. Later as the father and widow are about to enter his auto they accidentally meet Jack. The widow throws herself into his arms, hailing him as her hero. The father is mad with jealousy until explanations are made. Then a reconciliation is effected and two weddinge are consummated, Jack being in love with a very nice girl.

SWEET ALICE BEN BOLT (Sept. 19).—Ben Bolt on his way to school one day comes across little Alice, the little waif. He takes her to his home and the little orphan is taken to the hearts of Ben's kind father and mother. The years pass and the two young people grow fonder and fonder of each other, until at last Ben proposes and is accepted. That same day, he is impressed upon a British man-of-war by the notorious press gang and Alice waits for him to return. She goes in search of him, and while in a boat is struck by its jibboom and knocked senseless. She is picked up by a French man-of-war, but when she recovers consciousness, the Captain finds her memory has gone. He takes her ashore to some friends of his, and leaves her in their care. Meanwhile war has been declared and Ben has become more used to his surroundings. Off the coast of France, the British captain orders Ben and some sailors ashore for water and while returning to the ship they are attacked by a French skirmishing party. Ben is injured and drags himself by chance to the house in which Alice is being befriended. She fails to recognize him, but after a great deal of persuasion, the old people consent to Ben taking his former sweetheart back to England. When they arrive there, Ben shows Alice the places she knew so well in her childhood days, and the sight of the old mill, where they were betrothed, brings back memory to Alice.

THE BLIND MUSICIAN (Sept. 21).—The blind musician makes a good living by teaching the violin. His life is made bright by the love of his pretty little wife. One day they are both walking in the park when the old gentleman drops his cane. It is picked up by a pretty little child walking with her father. The child learns the old gentleman teaches the violin, and her father seeing in this an opportunity to get better acquainted with the pretty young wife, asks that the musician give his daughter lessons. Discontent enters the heart of the hitherto happy wife, and in her frailty she allows the father of her husband's pupil to make love to her. The blind musician giving lessons in the next room sends the little girl for some music, and while there, the little girl sees what she thinks is a struggle between her father and her teacher's wife. She rushes into the next room and tells the old gentleman; he listens and realizing what it means, takes a revolver and discharges it in the direction from which the noise of the struggle comes. The young wife has been trying to free herself from the now insulting embraces of the man, but she receives the shot in her arm. The police arrive upon the scene, but are told that the revolver was discharged by accident. The little child and her father now thoroughly ashamed of his conduct leave the unhappy musician with his wounded wife, and she, contrite, asks forgiveness, which is freely forgiven.

DOWN BY THE SOUNDING SEA (Sept. 17).—Jean, a young Briton fisherman, is betrothed to his cousin, Yvonne. A few days after the betrothal, Jean returns from a fishing trip. While sorting his fish on the beach he is accosted by the lady of the chateau who, attracted by his youth and strength, pauses to examine and buy his fish. She tells him to bring the fish along and they go together to her home. There she dismisses Jean, bidding him, however, to return the next day with more fish. Jean, dazzled by her beauty and grace, returns home to his good mother and little cousin in a trance. They cannot understand the change in their kindly good natured Jean. Milady flirts with Jean for several weeks and the simple fisherman falls deeply in love with the lady of high degree. He repulses his mother and sweetheart, who try to show him the folly of his infatuation. One day going to the chateau to see Milady, he meets her coming down the drive escorted by a man of her own caste. They are laughing and chatting together and Milady passes Jean without noticing him. For a moment he gazes after her stunned, then turning runs frantically along the beach in pursuit. His old mother sees him and calls after him in vain. Jean overtakes Milady and her escort at the great rock which had been the scene of many of their rendezvous. Milady casually says, "This is my fiance, Count Augard, Jean," then turns away and leaves him stunned. Jean sees them ride away and in an outburst of rage and despair loses his footing on the rock and falls, striking his head. He lies there until found by his mother, who has searched for him for hours. She finally gets him into a boat and home, where she and Yvonne nurse him back to health and reason. Love for his little cousin again fills his heart and he begs her forgiveness, which she readily accords, neither guessing that at that very instant the devoted old mother had met and defeated Milady in her effort to regain Jean. And the Briton sun covers the laughing ocean with its red warmth, casting a glow of cheer and courage over the happy love of the three.

FLO'S DISCIPLINE (Sept. 20).—Prof. Dow has a boarding school for boys, but owing to his nervous, timid nature is unable to establish suitable discipline to keep his scholars in check. For an assistant he has a rollicking young Irishman named Jack Doyle, who cares little for discipline and in his good-hearted way wants the boys to have as good a time as possible.

Flo, Prof. Dow's only daughter, a teacher of physical culture in a neighboring city, closes her class and arrives home just at the height of an unusually loud outburst on the part of the boys, over the reappearance of porridge for breakfast. Rescuing an unfortunate waiter from the clutches of the irate scholars, Flo starts in to quell the rebellion by discharging the assistant, Jack Doyle. This leads to a demonstration by the boys, in favor of Jack, whom they greet as their idol and carry him off triumphantly on their shoulders. Then follows a series of plots and counterplots, in which a garden hose, an ice house, and a long ladder play prominent parts, between Flo on the one side and the boys on the other, with Jack Doyle acting the part of an amused intermediary, when he is not busy balancing himself on a beam at the top of the ice house.

It all winds up by Flo conquering the rebels and establishing a system of perfect discipline and contentment throughout the school and the re-engagement of Jack Doyle as assistant principal and prospective bridegroom of the intrepid Flo.

LUX.

THE LITTLE BEGGAR BOY (Sept. 20).—No ray of sunshine, no kindly smile or friendly word ever found its way into the life of Antonio, the little beggar boy, until a tiny girl of wealthy parentage became interested in him. All day long, Antonio was forced to walk the streets soliciting alms from passers-by. At the end of the day his unscrupulous grandfather spends his earnings in nights of revelry, while poor little Antonio goes supperless to bed. When little Eva Conway's radiant glances fell upon the little beggar boy, he became possessed of new desires, and a longing to become a vender of flowers led him into trouble. The only method of acquiring his stock-in-trade which suggests itself to his little mind was to steal it. He therefore entered the grounds of a large mansion, and proceeded to help himself to some of the flowers. In this act he was caught, and severely rebuked by the owner of the mansion. This rebuke smote him sorely and he became possessed of a wild desire to revenge himself upon the owner of the mansion. He therefore suggested to his grandfather that the mansion would yield much rich booty if robbed. The old villain gathered together a few companions equally as unscrupulous as himself, and they proceeded to plan the robbery. In the meantime, Antonio learned that the man who had rebuked him was none other than the father of his little benefactress. Upon learning this, he sought to restrain his grandfather from attacking the mansion. Fearing that the child had relented and would spoil the job, the robbers bound him and left him at home. Antonio, now thoroughly determined to prevent the robbery at any cost, manages to burn his bonds away and escape. Upon his arrival at the mansion he was seen by the robbers, who promptly shot him. This did not, however, prevent him from giving the alarm and saving the mansion. His courageous act was the means of terminating his somewhat questionable career, for he was kindly received into the household and treated as a son, while little Eva learned to love him as a brother.

ECLAIR.

THE WORD OF HONOR (Sept. 24).—Four young men are playing cards. One of them, Henry Blackwood, has absent-mindedly laid his wallet on the table. They are called out of the room and all but Jim Ainslee leave at once. Ainslee is the sort who is traveling far beyond his means. He notices the wallet and then opens it and discovers it contains quite a sum. He extracts the money just before Blackwood returns in search of it. He finds it lying on the table, but upon opening it discovers the theft. He then compels all to undergo a search of their clothes, whereupon the money is found in Ainslee's possession. Jim pleads hard that he be not arrested nor informed upon. They all give their word of honor not to betray his temptation and act, and a paper to that effect is written and signed that as long as they live they will not disclose Ainslee's guilt.

Later Ainslee is left an inheritance and he wooes the girl Blackwood had hoped to marry. His fortune and his seeming gentlemanliness cause the girl to promise her hand. Blackwood learns and is about to expose Ainslee's true character to save the girl from the man so actually unworthy of her, when Ainslee reminds Blackwood of his word of honor.

Blackwood re-reads the note at his home and the simple line "as long as I live" strikes his eye and suggests. He writes a letter, telling all and prepares to do away with himself. But the girl's father chances to stop in, learns the truth and through much adroit maneuvering brings the girl and Blackwood into each other's arms, then orders Ainslee begone.

MAJESTIC.

THE BUTTERFLY (Sept. 24).—Nina is a veritable butterfly—gay and irresponsible. Will, a serious chap, falls in love with her and she accepts him. Six years pass. Nina is still a butterfly devoted to a gay set of merrymakers. She leaves her husband and child on the lawn to go off motoring with some friends. The child is taken ill and the mother goes to see him. Then forgetting all about him she starts to dress for a dinner and ball. Her husband comes in and she demands to know why he is not ready. He looks at her and tells her they cannot go—the boy is too sick. She runs out of the room to see the child, and meets the doctor who tells her he fears very much that the little boy has contracted small-pox. She then rushes to her own room and, grabbing a hand-mirror, scans her face. She tells her husband what the doctor said. He goes to the child. The doctor advises that the mother be sent for. She locks the door and sits shuddering. She falls asleep and dreams. She sees her son and her husband turn from her to leave her forever. She begs them to stay; they do not even notice her appeal but close the door in her face. She awakens to find herself banging on the door of her own room. She can hear the child crying. Without a moment's hesitation she dashes out. She goes to the child and he content falls asleep in her arms. Through the long hours she holds the little tense body. With the dawn the child relaxes and falls back on his pillows asleep. The doctor arrives and tells them that the child merely has the measles.

LOVE AND SCIENCE (Sept. 29).—Max Pledge, a young savant, is trying to perfect his invention which will enable a person to see the other person with whom he is talking over the telephone. He becomes so absorbed in his work that he will not see anyone. His sweetheart, Daisy, calls and he tells her he is too busy at the time, but if she will go home he will telephone her and she can see him then as he expects to have the invention ready for the first successful test.

Daisy is very much vexed at his inattention and determines to teach him a lesson by way of a practical joke. She asks her chum to join in her prank of dressing the chum up as a man with a mustache, so when Max calls up he shall see his sweetheart apparently kissing another man. Evening comes. Max telephones and his first test is a perfect success. He first sees his Daisy, then he sees the supposed man kiss her. His jealousy and anger is so ungovernable and through the hard work perfecting his invention his mind gives way. He forgets everything, cannot recognize anyone.

The doctors say the only way to restore his reason is to reproduce the same scene, but to give it an explanatory ending. The moving picture camera is called into service. The scene is re-enacted with the same tragic gestures as before. The supposed man with the mustache kisses Daisy as before. Max watches intently—suddenly the artificial mustache falls off and he at once recognizes Daisy's girl chum. Slowly his reason returns. The joke of it dawns upon him and he folds Daisy in his arms, never to doubt again.

MARY'S CHAUFFEUR (Sept. 22).—Hal Stowe, the good-hearted but rather dissolute scion of a wealthy house, is reprimanded by his father when he appears at breakfast with a "head." He is advised to mend his ways, but when he later appears at his father's office with a demand for money, the old man is disgusted and arranges to send him, under care of his chauffeur, to spend a while in the country at the house of a former business associate, Henry Hawkins.

This news is communicated to Hawkins in a letter, just as he is forced to absent himself from home on a business engagement. It is not altogether pleasing to Mary Hawkins, and, until she is acquainted with the character of the guest, she plans to have herself and maid change identities. This is done, with the approval of her mother.

Hal and the chauffeur, on their way by motor to the Hawkins home, stop at a road house, where a similar change of identities is effected as Hal is uncertain of his reception. Arriving at the house much is made of the pretended heir and Hal, as the chauffeur, is shown to quarters above the garage. He is attracted by the appearance of Mary and she is attracted to him, each believing the other to be a servant.

the master, and the maid, masquerading as the mistress, indulge in a hurried courtship, which ends in an engagement, they obtaining the consent of Mrs. Hawkins, who is greatly amused. Mary is overheard and seen by Hal one day with her mother, and he divines the real state of affairs. Pretending to be still in ignorance and wishing to be loved for himself alone, he leads an exemplary life and presses his suit to a happy completion.

The irate Hawkins arrives from town, accompanied by Stowe, Sr., to find his daughter in the arms of a chauffeur, as he thinks, but a few words of explanation and all is set aright, the chauffeur being willing to stay bound to the maid when he finds that she is of his own station in life.

NESTOR.

THE HORSETHIEF'S DAUGHTER (Sept. 16).—Bill Durbin, ostensibly a rancher, is in reality a receiver of stolen horses. His wife on her deathbed begged him to give up the life for the sake of their little girl, and he has half promised to do so, but the old associates and associations have proven too strong for him and he has drifted back again. His daughter, Tess, grows up a lovely woman, much loved by her rascally old father, who successfully deceives her as to his occupation.

One day, however, the full knowledge of her father's machinations comes to her.

Fresh horse thefts are reported. The sheriff suspects the thieves but has no definite proof. His assistant, a young man, offers to disguise himself and find out if possible.

Tom Wild is the most daring of Durbin's gang and is a valuable man to him. As Tess is clearing the dinner utensils one day, Wild takes the opportunity to tell her he wants her for his wife. She shows her horror of him and incites him to seize her. Roy, the sheriff's assistant, enters and throws him aside and calms the girl. Wild leaves, breathing vengeance. The girl calls Durbin and Roy, putting on an air of great humility, begs for a job, and although Durbin is naturally suspicious, his daughter persuades him to give him a trial.

Roy accomplishes the expected and the unexpected, he soon collects his proofs of the guilt of the rancher and his associates and he falls deeply in love with Tess. He takes the opportunity of telling Tess of his infatuation and begs her to go away with him. He determines to depart on the morrow.

Wild gets proof of the assistant sheriff's identity and he and Durbin determine to capture him. Tess gets wind of this and as she hears them coming begs Roy to hurry up to the loft where he is sleeping. She watches Wild and Durbin through her door. Durbin sleeps by the ladder which Roy must descend in the morning and Wild keeps watch. Roy creeps down the ladder early in the morning and Wild knocks him off. Roy drops his gun and grapples with Wild. Durbin wakes and joins Wild, and Tess, fearful that Roy is killed, runs in, picks up the revolver and holds the men at bay. The excitement proves too much for Durbin, who has a sudden attack of heart seizure. The sheriff and some cowboys arrive, having become alarmed at Roy's long absence, and take Wild prisoner with the others they have rounded up. Roy asserts his claims to Tess, who leaves with him to seek the beautiful new life.

A WESTERN VACATION (Sept. 18).—Two bachelors, Jeff and George, wonder where they will spend their vacation. They see an ad: "A retired wealthy rancher will take a few boarders for the summer at his beautiful ranch in Southern California. Address—J. B. Good, San Fernando, Cal.," and at once answer it and start for California.

They arrive, but that "beautiful ranch" proves to be such a tumbled-down old place that the boys insist upon Mr. Good taking them back to the station, until they behold his charming daughter, Bess. Then both agree to remain. Both start out to win the daughter and quarrel over her. Then they agree to toss up a coin, the loser to help the winner. George wins and Jeff at once sets out to help him, as the ranchman disapproves of them both, together with Jack, the man of Bess's choice. George writes Bess a note, which Jeff delivers—"Dear Bess: Will have buggy near house at 9 o'clock tonight. We will be married and leave for the East on the midnight train. George." Then he sends Jeff with a decoy note to Mr. Good. "Darling Bess:—Will have ladder at your window at 9 o'clock tonight, and we will fly together. If necessary, we'll chloroform your old dad. George."

It had the desired effect, to make Mr. Good very angry and agree with Jeff to wait quietly until 9 o'clock and then fall upon George and his daughter as they descended the ladder. In the meanwhile Bess came quietly out of the front door and drove away with George to the minister's, but asked him to wait until she had spoken to the minister, for she had sent a note to Jack, which read: "Dear Jack:—Be at the minister's house tonight at 9 o'clock and we will be married. BESS."

So while George was patiently waiting, Bess and Jack were married, and when he at last went inside to inquire for her, the bride and groom slipped outside and drove away in his buggy.

WON BY A CALL (Sept. 20).—Phillip Gray, a young doctor, goes West to start a practice, and falls in love with Bess Grandon, who lives on a nearby ranch. Her father is annoyed as he prefers Dick Smith a young rancher.

At a birthday party given in honor of Bess' twentieth birthday, Dick sees Phillip making great progress; so the next day he goes over to Bess's home and proposes to her. Poor Dick is refused. Phil calls and is shown into the room by Bess's brother. Dick feels very sore, and leaves Bess and Phil together. But they were not to have peace very long, for Bess's father, meeting Dick outside and asking him the reason for the long face, is told that the young doctor has beat him out. The rancher is quite mad and, telling Dick that he is his choice as a son-in-law, takes him back into the house and orders the young doctor out, never to come back again.

But the lovers meet and talk the matter over, and one day while they were having a secret meeting, Bess's brother sees Dick coming down the road in a buggy, and knowing that if Dick discovered them, he would tell their father, he rides ahead and warns Bess and Phil of his coming. Phil acts quickly. He tells Bess to lie down on the road, pretending she has fallen from her horse, Dick will ride up, think she is hurt and take her home, and Phil, being the only doctor around, they will have to send for him and then he will be able to fix things right.

Things work out better than expected, and Bess is taken home and the doctor sent for, Dick even going himself for him. Phil is all ready and waiting; but pretends to Dick that he has no time, as he has to hurry to another patient. He finally consents and goes. Arriving at the house he takes charge of the case, even to the point of ordering Dick from the room, and when the rancher protests at his conduct, he starts to walk out, but Bess, who has fallen into a faint, brings them all to her side, and Phil orders them all out. When the door is closed, they both laugh to think how they have fooled the old man.

A week later finds Bess in a wheel chair. When Dick comes to call he is told that she may never walk again, and he loses no time in getting out, as he doesn't want to have a crippled wife on his hands. So, with the coast clear, Phil tells the ranchman that he has a wonderful remedy that will cure Bess, and he is told that if he can cure her he can have her. The wedding soon follows, the ranchman is told of the lovers' ruse. Papa draws his gun, and instead of making a widow of Bess, he blesses the happy pair.

PROTECT YOUR M.P. MACHINE—ALWAYS OIL WITH 3 IN ONE

3 in One is a pure, clear oil that lubricates perfectly star wheel, fly wheel, shutter gear, rewinder and every other working part of every kind of a moving picture machine.

The oil flows right to the heart of all action points, preventing wear and tear, and making each part do its work smoothly and about 100 times easier. Won't collect dirt and clog as greasy oils do. Contains no acid or alkali to injure your machine. Won't gum—won't run. Cleans and polishes—prevents rust on all metal surfaces.

FREE OIL FOR YOU

Send today for a generous free sample and the free 3 in One Dictionary. You'll get enough oil for a real good test. So get the bottle and the book now.

10c, 25c, 50c at all good stores. The 50c size is the economical M.P. machine size.

THE STOLEN CUB

One Reel Subject, Released Thursday, September 26th

The portrayal of the love of a mother bear for her cub, stolen to become the pet of the forest officer's children, is closely interweaved with the vividly pictured story of desperate men and gunplay in the Canadian wilderness. How the wounded woodsman drags himself home after the ambush to find his family besieged by the maddened parent animal.

Dear Sir,

The "Simplex Projector" outfit we have had installed at the London Hippodrome, is, I am pleased to say, giving great satisfaction, both in regard to steadiness and flickerless projection.

The machine contains many distinct improvements over other types - - the entire enclosure of the film and all working parts, rendering it both dust-proof and absolutely fire-proof. The automatic adjustment of the Shutter is unique....It is a machine which will undoubtedly command a big sale in this country.

Yours faithfully,

C. Jeffries

CARBONS

ARE A GUARANTEE OF PERFECT PROJECTION

It is that wonderful, exquisite sweetness "Kubelic" draws out of his fiddle that makes his meal ticket spell $1000.00 per hour. A horse fiddle makes more noise but

"What a Difference!"

It is that quaint "humanly human" way "Whitcomb Riley" puts jingles together that makes him loved and famous. Not such great English but his "beat on the heart-strings"

"Makes a Difference."

It was the realism, fine arrangement of color and striking study of light and shadow that immortalized "Rembrandt." A circus ONE SHEET is sometimes even more striking but

"Oh! How Different!"

It is a Motion Picture when you only show "Flickering Shadows" that are meaningless, dull, indistinct, without perspective, roundness or depth and almost without interest. But on a "Mirror Screen" this same picture "comes to life," shows clear, true and sharp. Every detail is visible and not a shade, gleam or shadow is lost and "Believe Me"

"There IS a Difference."

It is a Motion Picture Theatre when your equipment and light is poor and you have a bum curtain. But the "Mirror Screen" insures you a great light so that an ordinary film shows like a FEATURE in comparison. Every foot is so realistic and natural that folks are spell-bound because pictures on a "Mirror Screen"

"Are Different."

It is the Extra Nickels over expenses that means Profits, Bread and Meat and some of Life's Luxuries. It is the "Mirror Screen" that will create a sensation in your theatre, bring the crowds, and it is the only way to get that Wonderful Light WITHOUT EYE-STRAIN. The old and young come and the pictures on the MIRROR are so delightful to look at that they won't miss a reel and that "Keep Them Coming" is what makes, in your bank balance,

"Such a Great Difference."

Please write us today and tell us WHY you don't order that MIRROR.

While It's Fresh

we want to tell you of it: The other day an exhibitor dropped in at our office and it did not take us long to convince him. Amongst many of the questions asked was this one: "A sixty-day release should look fairly good shown on your screen, should it not?" Well, we guess it should. Happening to have the following ABSOLUTELY genuine letter in our files we "showed him":

Winchester, Ky., July 31, 1912.

Gentlemen:

We think that we owe you something else besides paying you the price asked for the RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN you sold us. We thought at the time of purchase you were overcharging us on account of the seeming high price we paid you, but after using it for thirty days we find that it was the cheapest investment we have made since going in the picture business. You can make sixty and ninety day releases look like first run with your screen. If we could not get another we would not take ten times the price we paid for it.

We also desire to thank you for the courteous treatment we received at your hands, for you did more than you promised to do. You may refer any one to us.

Yours respectfully,
LYRIC THEATRE, Phillips & Moss,
signed, H. H. Phillips.

Saving in juice—pictures that are full of life and action. MOVING PAINTINGS—shown in lighted houses, soft, without glare, courteous treatment—that's the RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN.

You have tried the rest. Now buy the best.

G.MÉLIÈS

THE BOTTLE THAT LEADS THEM TO A TREASURE

THE BEACH COMBERS

Falsely accused of pocket-picking, Russell eludes the police and is given refuge in the humble home of a beach comber and his pretty daughter, Bess. He falls in love with Bess, and decides to make his living beach-combing, when the unexpected finding of a treasure hidden in the sand brings joy to the little household and visions of a better life. But upon reading of a bank robbery they realize that theirs is the stolen money. Russell at once notifies the bank authorities. The dream of prosperity seems ended. But he is rewarded handsomely, and so is Bess—indirectly.

Filming Surf Effect in "Miss Robinson Crusoe," the Most Beautiful Thanhouser Picture Ever Made, Surpassing "As It Was In the Beginning," and Every Other Pictorial Gem We Have Ever Issued. Released in 1500 feet Tues., Oct. 8, with a one and three sheet.

The Thanhouser Three-a-Week

"Please Help The Pore" — Sunday, September 29th

So read the placard on a toy hand-organ that a little girl played mournfully in the park. She wasn't poor at that, but she had heard her father speak of his need of a sum of money and decided to raise it for him! Instead she "raised" the miser who held her father's note—with the strains of the toy organ. She won his heart, too, the cute kiddie, and the day for her sorely-pressed parent.

"Letters of a Lifetime" — Tuesday, October 1st

A dying bachelor of wealth stumbles across some old letters and they call back the happy days of the past. He knows he has every comfort that money can buy—except friends—but the recollections the letters bring prove there is still a void. He is reminded of his brother, who remained poor through marrying, but who found happiness in his poverty. His reflections make an unusual film.

"The Warning" — Friday, October 4th

His story with the remarkable "twist" will work greater benefit for the temperance cause than an army of solemn lecturers. Be sure to let all the temperance, mission, reform and uplift societies round about know you have it. A man addicted to drink takes his motherless son with him on a fishing trip. What seems to be the child's actual adventure completely sobers the father and he renounces the "cup that cheers" for all time.

The Thanhouser Features (Coming)

MISS ROBINSON CRUSOE, the "Most Beautiful" Film. Issued in two reels with "Specimens from N. Y. Zoological Park," Oct. 8.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE, Our Much-Heralded Charles Reade Classic. Issued in two reels as a "perfect publicity" feature, Oct. 29.

FOR THE MIKADO. Second of the Japanese Novelties Produced by Miss Taku Takagi and Her Special Japanese Company. In one reel, Oct. 18.

"Across the Broad Pacific"

An intimate camera trip to Japan and China, exploring the rivers, cities, viewing the customs and industries and partaking of the life on shipboard. Replete with picturesque features. Book it at once!

Released Wednesday, Sept. 25th.

"The Adventure of the Button"

A sprightly comedy-drama that abounds in merry situations and laughable humor. Howard Missimer, John Steppling, Charles Hitchcock, Eleanor Blanchard and all of Essanay's famous fun-makers in great roles! A corking good release for the initial Wednesday date!

Released Thursday, Sept. 26th.

"A Little Louder, Please!"

A snappy comedy subject, unusual in bright plot and showing how father bests two tricky lovers who try to win his charming daughter unfairly. Missimer, Steppling, Calvert, Lily Branscombe and Eleanor Blanchard in splendid laugh portrayals.

Released Friday, Sept. 27th.

"The Voice of Conscience"

An extraordinary and enthralling drama, powerful in plot and magnificently portrayed. An accidental death, the fastening of the guilt on an innocent man, and the terrible ordeal undergone by the guilty man until Fate wrings a confession from him. Harry Mainhall and Francis X. Bushman in feature roles!

Released Saturday, Sept. 28th.

"An Indian Sunbeam"

A fine Western drama with scenes laid among the Indians of the hill country. Staged by the man the world acknowledges to be the master of modern film-craft, G. M. Anderson!

"GETTING MARY MARRIED."
Monday, September 23rd.

Smile. That's it, smile. Look happy, for you have reason to be. This is the original mirth distributer—a thousand feet of pure, unadulterated laugh getters. You'll feel as though someone was tickling your ribs when the story starts. Go after it now and give your audience a treat.

"THE PARSON AND THE MOONSHINER."
Thursday, September 26th.

It's a real King Baggot sensation. That ought to be enough to satisfy you. But lest you feel uneasy, just remember that it's the kind of Baggot picture that get's underneath the skin. The kind that will sway your patrons with emotion. Will make them love this picture hero all the more, and bring them closer to you and your show.

"LIE NOT TO YOUR WIFE" and "CURING HUBBY."
Saturday, September 28th (Split).

Sunny Jim never smiled as broadly as your patrons will when they see these two scream-getters. Funny situations, still funnier grimaces of the funny actors. A strong number for your Saturday program.

REX

"THE OLD ORGANIST."
Thursday, Sept. 26th.

Sublime in its simplicity. That kind of delicate pathos which is so pleasing, so entertaining and amusing. A beautiful story most impressively directed. A picture for the masses and the classes. You are bound to make money with it.

"THE HIDDEN BONDS."
Sunday, September 29th.

A distinct fascination pervades this picture. From the moment it's flashed on the screen it has a charm that will keep their eyes glistening with enjoyment. A most superior cast, excellent staging and masterful directing make this a dramatic release much out of the ordinary, and one that will be appreciated by your patrons.

CHAMPION

"THE ROSE OF THE ISLAND."
Monday, September 23rd.

There's an irresistible appeal about it that will make it the most pleasing offering you have given for months. The startling emotionalism, pathos and happy ending, coupled with a star cast and most excellent producing, make it a masterpiece well worth demanding. Do it now and let your patrons know it's coming.

101 BISON

"THE SHERIFF'S REWARD."
Tuesday, September 24th.

Don't go to sleep to-night until you've made sure that you have booked this Western sizzler. It's chock full of action. Just the sort that your patrons are yelling for. Plenty of thrills, plenty of romance and splendid acting. Entire picture staged midst beautiful surroundings. The most exciting "101"-Bison you've booked for a good long time.

"AT OLD FORT DEARBORN."
Saturday, September 28th.

FIGHT FOR IT. IT'S WORTH IT. If you've ever felt the least doubt about our "101"-Bisons, just glance this over and then go out and fight for it. No Western has ever been made that surpasses this from any standpoint. In massive mobilization, picturesque grandeur; proficient, exciting execution and correctness in construction along historical lines, this is the best "101"-Bison you ever laid eyes on. And they are getting bigger and better. Just you watch for them.

POWERS

"THE PLAN THAT FAILED."
Wednesday, September 25th (Split).

You ought to get spanked just as hard and as often as the children were in this kid's comedy if you don't book this right away. You'll afford the "kiddies" and their mothers more fun with this picture than they could get at the circus. Brimful of comical practical jokes. Funnier than Peck's Bad Boy.

On the Same Reel:
"SWAT THE FLY."

It is your duty to get this picture and help instruct the children and the grown folks about the greatest carriers of disease in the world. The most interesting, most instructive film ever released. Get it. You owe it to every patron of your house to show it.

"HER AMBITION."
Friday, September 27th.

To her the possession of glistening baubles, gorgeous gowns and elaborate entertaining was the height of her ambition. But when reverses set in and she realized the fickleness and hypocricy of her friends, the love so long dormant asserted itself. She stripped herself of her finery and became the loving, dutiful wife that he had married. A most masterful conception of an admirable story.

AMBROSIO

"ARABIAN INFAMY."
Release date later.

DON'T FORGET THAT WEDNESDAY IS THE BIG AMBROSIO DAY. To start off these very superior releases is the finest lion picture ever produced. They'll be standing four deep clamoring for admission when you bill this thrilling, gripping, stupendously spectacular picture. Don't forget Real Lions play an important part.

Universal Film Manufacturing Co., 1 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

"DEMAND THAT UNIVERSAL PROGRAM!"

ECLAIR

"THE WORD OF HONOR."
Tuesday, September 24th.

Hypnotizingly fascinating. That's about the best way to put it. The situations are tense from the first scene until the exposure of the club cad. A dramatic story most impressively enacted and staged.

"THE OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS."
Thursday, September 26th.

A "living pictorial poem." It's like a dream which reveals itself in animated pictures. Fanciful effects, mysterious, awe-inspiring, truly marvelous effects that will make you rub your eyes and pinch yourself to see if you're awake. It's a wizard's conception of Longfellow's poem. Just as lovable a picture as he was a poet.

"LOVE AND SCIENCE."
Sunday, September 29th.

When it gets noised about the town that you are showing this beautiful comedy-drama, with just a touch of scientific genius, they will come in droves from the opposition. A very novel idea most effectively interwoven in a romance of particular merit.

VICTOR

Friday, September 27th.

There's plenty of romance to this clever Florence Lawrence release and intense exciting moments that grip more and more as the story is unfolded. Insist upon having it. Take advantage of this crowd-getting, applause producer, and bill it big. Bill it early.

MILANO

"THE MYSTERIOUS AUTO" and "HONESTY PUNISHED."
Saturday (Split), September 28th.

You'll laugh your head off when you see these mirth provokers. These comedies aren't forced. They are clean cut humorous situations, well staged and most ludicrously enacted.

NESTOR

"CARL VON GORDON'S FAMILY."
Monday, September 23rd.

Ever have a stitch in your side from laughing? Well, if you want to experience that delightful sensation, take a look at this picture. Laugh? Why, you'll have to tie them to the seats so that they won't roll all over the house in fits of convulsive laughter. One round of screamingly funny situations from start to finish.

"THE CRIMINOLOGIST."
Wednesday, September 25th.

Insist upon your exchange booking this for you. Do it now. The most novel, up-to-date idea in motion picturedom. How a criminal was transformed to the law-respecting man that he was before the accident. An excellent, vivid interpretation of the advance of surgery. An attention-riveter of exceptional merit.

"PERCY, THE BANDIT."
Friday, September 27th.

Just imagine it. A ribbon counter jumper as a real honest-to-God hold-up man. Can you conceive of the laugh-getting possibilities? Well, you haven't imagined half of the howling situations we've created. Simply immense.

GEM

"THE LEGEND OF MONTMARTE."
Tuesday, September 24th.

There's an infusion of fantasy in this picture that lasts from beginning to end. Something sublime about it that will make a lasting impression. The treachery of a man and the heroism of another form a gripping, thrilling story that has been most dramatically produced. An excellent cast and superior staging make it a release of exceptional merit.

THE RENEGADES

Jim Carson and his pretty wife have a cabin home near the claim. Jim's violent temper drives his wife away and on leaving she accepts the escort of a prospector across the hills. They are attacked by Indians and the cries bring Jim to the rescue. He then believes his wife is eloping with a lover and after nursing him back to recovery proposes a duel. An Indian, however, shoots Carson and in return is killed by the prospector, who remains back with the widow.

Released Thursday, Sept. 26th, 1912. Length 573 Feet.

BUSTER AND THE GYPSIES

Buster, Henrietta and Brooks go to a Church Fair. Buster and Brooks have an altercation and Buster is promptly sent to bed. There he dreams that his hated rival abducts the fair Henrietta and takes her to a Gypsy Camp. Buster goes to the rescue and after a severe conflict wakes up still fighting.

Released Thursday, Sept. 26th, 1912. Length 483 Feet.

SWIMMING and LIFE SAVING

Guy M. Bailey, ex-champion swimmer of the world, gives a wonderful exhibition of rescuing a drowning man, and the resuscitating by the one man process. He also sleeps, eats, drinks and smokes under water. The picture is thrilling and instructive.

Released Friday, Sept. 27th, 1912. Length 566 Feet.

THE WATER WAGON

Jerry Gayboy, after a bat, resolves to go on the water wagon; hence he takes a job as street sprinkler. He, however, falls off and takes just one more. He renews the jag and as he drives the wagon squirts the water over everybody he sees. The crowd pull him off the wagon and, tying him behind the cart, give him all the water that is coming to him.

Released Friday, Sept. 27th, 1912. Length 498 Feet.

GLUED

Billy Altman, a photoplay author unable to sell his scripts, tries to commit suicide by swallowing a pint of glue. The only effect that the glue has on Bully is that it makes his breath so sticky that everything he comes in contact with adheres. Chairs, tables and people cling together and cannot be separated.

Released Saturday, Sept. 28th, 1912.
Length, 1067 feet.

THE DOCTOR'S DEBT

Ethel Jordan, daughter of the lighthouse keeper, and her sweetheart Harry Myers save the lives of Doctor Morris and his wife when their motorboat is wrecked on a submerged rock. The Doctor is anxious to repay the debt and has an opportunity very quickly. Myers falls sick and Ethel finds that the motor of her boat has been tampered with by a discarded lover, she swims to shore and the good doctor saves her sweetheart's life.

Released Monday, Sept. 30th, 1912. Length, about 1,000 feet.

A GIRL'S BRAVERY

A picnic party needing eggs for breakfast dispatch Harry Tennant on the quest. He meets the lockkeeper's daughter and after getting a supply continues to visit the girl. It is an admirable courtship until brother John objects and in an altercation throws Harry into the canal. Emily dashes into the stream and rescues her sweetheart, much to the happiness of all.

Facts and Comments

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in its foreign notes deals with cinematographic conditions in Australia, and it is hoped that the lesson of the value of advertising extensively in the daily press has been conveyed with sufficient emphasis. We are in receipt of a letter from Mr. J. D. Williams, in which he says that his firm spends seventy-five thousand dollars a year in advertising in the newspapers. He attributes half of his success to this one point alone. We quote from his letter: "If the exhibitors in America could be induced to use the newspapers more for their publicity they would be repaid twofold, and it would have a wonderful tendency to uplift the business." We have for years urged the advantages of advertising in the daily press upon exhibitors. Some progress, we are glad to say, has been made in this direction. Five years ago practically no exhibitors were advertising in the daily press of their cities, while to-day such advertising is used in more than one city. It is plain, however, that a much greater use of the newspaper could be made, and that the country is full of neglected opportunities. In the big cities of the country almost no advertising is done in the daily press.

Why do exhibitors hesitate in buying more advertising in the daily press and thus making their appeal to the general public? In the central part of every American city of the first rank there are scores of large theatres exhibiting motion pictures. These theatres seek to draw their patronage from the entire city. The newspapers circulate throughout the entire city. A large advertisement attractively worded is bound to bring results. We realize that we are now giving first lessons in the principles of advertising, but we have no apologies to offer, as none of these first lessons have been put in practice by the majority of exhibitors.

Beside the immediate financial gain as the result from such advertising, there is to be considered the influence on the editorial attitude of the newspaper which carries the advertisement. Much of the enmity toward the moving picture on the part of the press is due to theatrical influences, and these theatrical influences would never have taken hold of the editorial sanctum had it not been for the steady and profitable advertising and an abundance of complimentary tickets. If it is impossible to get a fair hearing and decent treatment for the motion picture by an appeal to journalistic honor we cannot be blamed for seeking to pay for it in cash. It is not we who lower our standards but the editors of prejudiced newspapers. A practical way of advertising in the daily press would be for the big exhibitors in any given city to get together and create a common fund with which to buy, say, one column per day. If there are a dozen exhibitors and they buy at annual rates the expense will be much less and there will be room for each to set forth the good points of his own particular programme. In this way the public would soon learn where to look for moving picture announcements and a general increase of business would result. In the land which has given birth to the press agent there ought to be no lack of publicity for the motion picture. We are glad to learn from Mr. Williams that he is mailing his letter "to a number of manufacturers in America to point out the necessity of newspaper publicity, which is the best means of elevating the motion picture business to a very high standard with the public generally."

THAT motion pictures have in thousands of cases drawn men away from the saloon and restored them to their families has often been pointed out before, but never was more concrete proof furnished than in the case reported from Pottsville, Pa. In the county within which Pottsville is situated there was such a marked falling off in the applications for liquor licenses that the Board of Judges decided to make an investigation. It was ascertained by the investigators that the decrease in saloons was directly traceable to the spread and continued popularity of the motion picture. The philosophy of this pleasing fact is quite plain. Men and women who have been working all day in mills and factories want to have some recreation in the evening. If nothing better is offered to them, they will go to the saloon, but they do not go there by preference. A cheap and wholesome entertainment to which the wife and children may be taken with perfect propriety will be much preferred to the saloon in nine cases out of ten.

A Newark paper commenting on "Moving Pictures against Saloons" rises to make this sagacious remark: "The degree of censorship exercised over moving picture shows has raised the standard and, generally speaking, they are now entertaining, instructive and unobjectionable in themselves." Censorship has had mighty little to do with "raising the standard." The raising of the standard is due to public opinion and sentiment and to the keen realization of their responsibility by the better class of manufacturers.

AN optimistic theatrical manager in Albany, N. Y., expresses the hope that moving pictures are creating a taste for the highest kind of spoken drama, and are therefore not only not antagonistic to the legitimate stage but have a tendency to recruit theatregoers from classes of the population that have heretofore never patronized the theatre. The thought is by no means a new one and has been expressed in various ways. This particular manager advises his confreres to "book plays that have been put into pictures, realizing their double drawing power, for a play in pictures gives it much advertising and gains the confidence of the public regarding its merits." Now, there are two sides to this theory. We have known of more than one case where the play in motion pictures spoiled the interest in the same play, when given at the same time or place on the speaking stage. In a city not a thousand miles from New York the dear old reliable melodrama, "East Lynne," was being advertised by the management of the local opera house. A motion picture theatre in the same city advertised the motion picture "East Lynne" for the same night. The result was astonishing. On the night of the performance in question the opera house was almost empty, while the small motion picture theatre gave its exhibition to a crowded house and could not begin to accommodate all the patrons that clamored for admission.

Educational Films

By Louis Reeves Harrison

IT is very generally understood that moving pictures have come to play an important part in the preparation of big and little children for complete living, but no one has appeared with a definite programme, and the lists sent forth as educational are disappointing. This is not at all astonishing so far as the producers are concerned—they are not engaged in studying the aims and tendencies of our schools—but those who are ready and willing to pay good prices for educational releases have brought their ideas to no comprehensive formula.

It is known that a tremendous demands exists. That is positive, and it is growing every day. How is it to be met? Some of the most recent systems, such as the recitation method, are wholly out of the question if they are not directly opposed to what can be accomplished by the pictures, and, at first glance, it would appear that the elimination of the superfluous in what is now being offered might go a long way toward solving the problem of suiting supply to demand. Let us see.

Aside from reading and oral work the present course includes geography, history, elementary science, arithmetic, language and manual arts. Moving pictures address themselves naturally to the first three, and to render the subject free from complexity let us consider geography alone. It now looks as though we were reaching a starting point for simplicity of requirement, but the first definition of the word opens up a field so extensive that it must be given to be appreciated.

Geography: The science of the description of the earth's surface in its present condition, and of the distribution upon it of its various products and animals, especially of mankind, etc., the divisions being botanical, descriptive, medical, physical, political, historical and sacred. As can be easily seen this branch ranges the wide world, often running parallel with history. The pioneer stories of our own country, when they record on the screen the actual events of our past, would be much more valuable, because more clearly grasped, if accompanied by maps, thus intermingling the studies.

There are a lot of earnest people of undoubted integrity who are urging the production of educational reels and who are only half aware that present systems are fast yielding to the enlightened view that a person's judgment of value in a thing learned springs from awakened sensibilities. Not until a pupil's interest in a subject is aroused does he perceive its worth or its relation to his needs. On this account I hardly dare urge what I believe would be of the highest value in educational films.

To draw any sharp lines between closely connected branches of learning is something that may be done when some definite plan of instruction by moving pictures is under way, and to expose my own immature plans to hasty criticism at this moment is not any part of my purpose, but I stand clearly on the ground that moving pictures cannot become educational in the best sense of the word unless those viewing them from in front are brought face to face with something attractive.

For instance, the geography of our own country involves the changes that have taken place since the days of Indian tradition along the progress of early settlers into constructive improvements, public buildings and places of historical interest, together with the stories relating to these varied changes—by stories I mean true ones. A silly love story injected into a film of serious intent destroys its educational value and offers absolutely nothing in compensation for the loss.

In making a single reel or a progressive series of historical-geographical pictures it will be necessary for men of intelligence to select the finest materials pertaining to a place and its most important epoch and weave these into a presentation so interesting that it will command the attention of all who see it. The best is none too good for our children, and that best will find a place in the respect of grown people wherever it is shown. Such educational films, when brought to a high state of perfection, will hold attention, strengthen the memory, stimulate the imagination and nourish the growth of moral character. They will be truly educational.

If moving pictures only weaken the mind and undermine true education by a scattering and superficial knowledge they will simply forecast the utter failure of the New Art and relegate it in time to places of entertainment catering to primitive tastes alone. This tendency is visible now in spite of the fact that nearly every intelligent man and woman in the country can see that the pictures might bring the light of culture to school and home life.

I cannot give illustrations within the limitations of any brief article on the subject, but my meaning may be made plainer by consideration of the difference between what operates as a strain on attention and that which, by force of interest, becomes exhilarating and delightful and thus deeply impressive without mental effort. The difference is that between drudgery and delight. The old doctrine of formal discipline is still behind the rigor and hardship of herding children together in public schools and the belief still obtains that whatever is irksome and disagreeable hardens a child to meet the struggles of daily existence.

A brilliant woman in Italy disproved these antiquated ideas by sending defective children far ahead of normal ones tortured under old systems, and her methods were so gentle that the little ones intrusted to her care found their hours of study the brightest of the day. She led them along by small tendrils of sympathetic interest faster than children more fortunately situated, so far as early nourishment was concerned, could be driven.

Examination of the latest and best systems of education, those which are leaving the dull and mechanical exercises of the mind that some of us cordially hated to be classed with the physical torture of the Dark Ages, will enlighten those who are giving serious consideration to moving pictures as a contributing agent in modern forms of education. No intrusive tales not bearing on the subject should be permitted—they are neither one thing nor the other—but the story must be there, unfolded in some delightful form, to hold those it is intended to benefit.

This seems to be very little to say on so large a subject, but a comprehensive treatise might be of less value —there is a tremendous question of judgment involved. The subjects to be selected at the outset must stimulate thought, but they must be so presented as to stir an undercurrent of feeling into action that will float the facts into lasting remembrance. I cannot see how moving pictures are to be seriously taken as educational unless they impart something in the way of knowledge by means that are in full accord with the latest approved methods.

"Kings of the Forest" (Selig)

REVIEWED BY JAS. S. McQUADE

THE Selig series of films in which wild animals played their parts created great interest and equally as great surprise at the time of their releases, nearly two years ago. The novelty of such subjects still makes a strong appeal to picture-lovers, for the dangers surrounding lonely settlers in the African wilderness are pictured with such realism in these Selig films as to excite the imagination and place the spectator in the midst of the perils.

The latest Selig spellbinder of this type is "Kings of the Forest," a two-reel subject, written and produced by Colin Campbell, of the Western company. Although his name does not appear in the cast of characters, nor he himself in the pictures, "Big Otto," Selig's wild animal expert, may well be termed the mainspring of action, so far as the acting of the majestic lions and the big cat-like leopards are concerned. Otto's wonderful handling of these savage animals, out in the open, is truly a marvel of skillful training and control.

One will hardly believe that the African scenes in these films, through which lions roam and leopards prowl, are laid on the wild animal farm of the Selig Company, near Los Angeles. Dense brakes, beautiful stretches of glade, forbidding expanses of veldt and charming rural spots crowned with haymows, are all faithfully reproduced. So also is the cave, which shows the lioness and her cubs, with the savage lord of the family on a ledge of rock above them. This remarkable scene will doubtless cause much wonderment among nature-lovers, as it is well known that a lioness will not permit her mate to come near her lair when she is bringing up her young. "Big Otto" must be asked to explain this mystery.

The part of the heroine of the story, Sona, is most satisfyingly sustained by that capable and winsome actress, Miss Betty Harte. I have watched very closely every movement and gesture and facial expression made by Miss Harte, and did not experience the slightest discord between what should have been, in my estimation, and what was, in her enacting of Sona. Standing out prominently in mind's eye, because of Miss Harte's happy impersonation, are the following scenes: Sona's greeting of her husband, Fritz, after the birth of her first child; Sona's greeting of her old friend, John Vogel; Sona's forlorn and physical collapse when her husband violently thrusts her from him, jealous of John Vogel; Sona's delight in finding her child unhurt, on her return from the well; Sona's resolute stand against her husband's brutality, when she leaves her home and braves the perils of a journey to the home of her parents, and her brave fight against savage animals to protect her child. Sona's fearlessness of being wrongly accused, by reason of her innate goodness and virtue, and her righteous resentment of her husband's coarse-grained jealousy are very quietly and effectively developed.

Scene from Selig's Two-Part Wild Animal Masterpiece, "Kings of the Forest."

Thomas Santschi has done excellent work in his impersonation of Fritz, Sona's husband. He has simulated well the violent bursts of jealous passion, as well as the tender moments, of that thickheaded, shortsighted, faithful hubby. John Vogel, the old friend of Sona and her parents, who had been selected by Sona's father for her husband, but who wisely saw that he was not the man and that Fritz was, is very creditably presented to us by Roy Watson. As Mr. Watson portrays him, the honest-hearted Boer is as true as steel and as hard as nails, both in physique and action.

And little Baby Lillian Wade, she deserves a small paragraph, all by herself. What an exquisite combination of tiny girl charms have we in Baby Lillian! She is always little Iona, the tiny, lovable child of her mother, Sona, and of her "pap," Fritz. If mother thinks "pap" has treated her wrongly, Iona thinks so, too, and comforts her with a wealth of affection that stirs her into immediate action. Who will forget the scene in the depths of the forest when Iona hides in the trunk to escape the prowling leopards? The face of the sleeping tot as she lies there, heedless of danger in the forgetfulness of sleep, is one of the sweetest child pictures I have ever seen. The strongest scene in the two films, in my judgment, is that showing Iona as she lifts the lid of the trunk from within, appearing before her distracted parents and their good friend, John Vogel, like a visitor from angel-land! I waft a kiss to you, Baby Lillian, because you never forgot during those pictures that you were little Iona, and nothing more.

John and Mrs. Kruge lead a hard life on a Boer farm, out in the wilderness. Little of the world's good things have come their way, but Heaven has blessed them with a beautiful daughter, Sona. John Kruge has picked out a husband for his daughter, a stanch, open-hearted Boer, John Vogel. Sona, however, has selected her own mate in the person of Fritz, a stalwart and devoted youth. John Vogel decides in his own mind that he is not the man, and gives way to his rival. Fritz and Sona are married, and we see them leave the old homestead in a cart, drawn by a cow, the only domestic beast they can boast of among their family possessions.

Fritz finds a location for his new home, and we see him building a hut for the shelter of himself and wife. Wild animals abound in the vicinity, and we never see Fritz or his wife go out of doors without a rifle in hand. One day Sona leaves the little home to bring water from a well. She closes the door behind her, leaving little

Iona, her baby girl, playing on the floor. A leopard is seen prowling around the house immediately after her departure and, with instinctive warning, the mother feels that her child is in danger. Hastily filling her pitcher, she forces her way through the thick underbrush towards her home. To her horror she spies the leopard. She throws down the pitcher and discharges the rifle several times at the animal, which rushes away. On arriving at her home she finds the child uninjured, and, while embracing her, is joined by her husband, who has been attracted by the shooting. An affecting scene of domestic bliss follows, during which the husband embraces his wife and child and then returns to work.

At this time John Vogel has appeared in the neighborhood, to make a call on his old friend Sona and her husband. Sona is extremely pleased to see him and shows her delight by kissing him. Fritz chances upon the scene at this moment and is seized with a fit of jealousy. He stands for a time considering whether or not he will shoot his supposed rival; then he changes his mind and approaches his home. In a towering rage, he rebukes Sona and threatens Vogel with deadly hurt. Vogel, however, strong in his innocence, puts the weapon aside and explains that Sona has received him affectionately only because of the old friendship and of the solitude to which she has been accustomed for several years. Fritz refuses to listen to reason and throws his wife violently from him. He then turns from the spot and plunges into the forest.

John Vogel knows Sona's temper and, fearing the result of the family trouble, sets out in search of Fritz. In the meantime Sona collects several household effects and wearing apparel, harnesses the cow and sets out on her journey homeward, with little Iona on the driving seat beside her.

Vogel finds Fritz and, after a time, succeeds in showing him the folly of his course. They immediately turn their steps to the little home and, on arriving there, find that Sona has departed. Distracted, Fritz turns to Vogel for advice and the two immediately start on the trail to overtake the fugitive wife.

We see Sona and her child passing through the glades of the forest under a moonlit sky, she worn out with fatigue and fearful of the wild animals along her path. She arrives at a favorable spot, and, alighting, makes arrangements to sleep there for the night. She brings the little calf from the rear of the wagon and, fastening a stone to the end of a rope around its neck, leaves it for the night. The mother cow is tethered at an adjoining point.

Sona is awakened by the approach of a monstrous lion, who has pounced on the calf and made away with it. Hastily rising and seizing her rifle, she follows the animal, firing several ineffectual shots at the retreating beast. She then returns to the camp to find that her baby has disappeared. The shots fired by her have brought Fritz and John Vogel to the spot, and they are also in despair, thinking that the lion has carried away the child. The two men start out in pursuit of the lion. In the meantime, the frantic mother searches every place in the neighborhood, but in vain. Fritz runs across the lion and seeing that it carries something in its mouth, and believing it to be his child, succeeds in wounding it. When he comes to the spot where the lion had dropped its prey, he finds that it is the remains of the calf. He returns to the camp, where Vogel has rejoined Sona.

Fritz and Vogel are satisfied that it is useless to remain longer on the scene, and load the wagon with the effects which have been placed on the ground during the night by Sona. Among the latter is a trunk. Fritz is vainly endeavoring to control his wife when Vogel notices that the lid of the trunk is being raised by someone within. Hurriedly he lifts it and discovers Iona. The child, seeing leopards approaching the wagon, just after her mother departed in pursuit of the lion, had hidden herself in the trunk, where she had slept during the fearful minutes spent by her parents and John Vogel. The reunion of the mother and child is the most affecting scene in the two reels.

"Kings of the Forest" will be released in about two months, but no fixed date has yet been made.

For photography and technique these films will commend themselves to all picture-lovers.

"The Voice of Conscience" (Essanay)

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade

"THE Voice of Conscience," by one of Essanay's Eastern companies, under the direction of Theodore Wharton, will be released on September 27th. The scenario was written by Harry Mainhall, who also appears in the principal role.

The character of Jack Tenney is not an appealing one. It is of the neurotic type and betrays both physical and moral weakness. This, however, must not be allowed to militate against Mr. Mainhall's impersonation, which brings out realistically the vacillating conduct of the young man, who has done no wrong, but who fears to meet squarely the situation which places him under grave suspicion of being a murderer.

Scene from "The Voice of Conscience" (Essanay).

"Put yourself in his place," will be good advice for all who view this film. Many, no doubt, will exclaim, almost at the outset, "How improbable! How foolish for a man to act so!" But the circumstances, and the course taken by Jack Tenney, are by no means improbable, although all must admit that he acted foolishly. It is only when another man, William Sherman, just as innocent of the crime as Tenney, has been found guilty of murder that conscience forces the weakling to tell the truth. The excitement of the moment brings sudden death to him, as he is a victim of heart disease, and here again the spectator will be prone to rebel against such a climax; but sober reflection will suggest that the ending is not only possible but probable in the course of human affairs.

One regrets that the sterling actor Francis X. Bushman has not a part more worthy of his art than is found in the role of William Sherman. His quiet, grave dignity in the courtroom, as the prisoner accused of murder and found guilty, is a fine exhibition of clever character acting. Miss Martha Russell, too, has very little to do, but like every capable actress, has done that little well. The Sheriff has been portrayed to the life by Harry Cashman, and Bryant Washburn as Dick Morgan, the rollicking roommate of the neurotic Tenney, is an excellent foil to the latter. The court scenes are well massed, and convey convincingly the atmosphere that prevails when life and death are in the scales of Justice.

The photographic work is commendable throughout this one-reel subject.

Following is the cast of the principal characters:

Jack Tenny.....Harry Mainhall
William Sherman....Francis X. Bushman
Frank Craig.....William Walters
His wife.....Helen Dunbar
His daughter.....Martha Russell
Dick Morgan, Jack's roommate,
Bryant Washburn
Sheriff.....Harry Cashman

Fannie Craig and William Sherman are sweethearts. She is the daughter of Frank Craig, a retired capitalist, who has given his sanction to her preference for young Sherman. It is early in the fall, and Craig invites his prospective son-in-law to accompany him on a hunting trip. We see the men set out in high spirits, after saying good-bye to Fanny and her mother.

Jack Tenney, who also lives in the neighborhood, decides to go hunting the following day. He goes alone. He is successful in bagging several grouse on his first day out, and chances on the camp of Craig and Sherman. He is engaged in cleaning the game when Craig approaches. The latter stumbles and falls on Tenney's hunting knife, the blade piercing his right lung, causing almost instant death. In a panic of fear and terror, young Tenney seizes his rifle and flees from the spot.

William Sherman, who had left the camp a few minutes before, to draw water for the preparation of the evening meal, returns and finds Craig unconscious. He believes there is still a spark of life left and laves the forehead of the dead man with water. While thus engaged, the sheriff chances to ride past. Noticing the actions of Sherman, he dismounts and approaches the spot. Sherman explains matters to him, in accordance with his own knowledge; but the sheriff is skeptical. Kneeling, he examines the wound which has caused death and then, springing up, seizes Sherman and accuses him of murder. Vainly does young Sherman protest his innocence, but the sheriff claims him as his prisoner and conducts him to jail. In due time he is charged with murder and the date of his trial set.

Jack Tenney, on his way home on that fateful day, lost the hunting knife which had accidentally killed Craig. He spent a sleepless night, and on the following day read an account in the newspapers of the killing of Frank Craig by his friend, William Sherman, and of the imprisonment of the latter and the forthcoming trial. He is overcome by remorse; but the craven, hereditary fear in his heart compels him to maintain silence. He visits the courtroom several times during the trial of Sherman, and suffers untold tortures as he watches the tightening of the meshes of the law on the innocent prisoner. Returning home one day he discovers on the table of his sitting-room the fatal hunting knife. It had been accidentally found by his roommate, Dick Morgan. He looks on it and shrinks in horror. Turning in another direction, he discovers one of his handkerchiefs stained with blood, a fac-simile of that other handkerchief which he had used to staunch the flow of blood from Craig's wound at the hunting camp. It chanced that his roommate, Morgan, had used this handkerchief that very morning, when shaving, and, having cut himself, had wiped the blood on it. To the highly-strung nerves of Tenney it seemed that these silent witnesses of the accident had appeared before him by supernatural power, and he rushes from the room like a madman.

The last day of the trial arrives, with little hope for the prisoner. The case is given to the jury, and Sherman calmly awaits their verdict. Tenney, in the meantime, has persisted in keeping silent and experiences an inferno of mental anguish. He is in the sitting-room, on the day of the verdict, when his friend, Dick Morgan, enters. The latter, while passing an art store in the city, had been attracted by an etching entitled "The Voice of Conscience," and had purchased it. Wholly ignorant of his friend's secret, he unfolds the picture. Tenney seizes it and looks at it with eyes bulging with conviction and terror. With the wild scream of a man demented, he throws it from him and rushes from the room.

In the courtroom the jury has just returned the verdict, "Guilty," when the solemnity of the proceedings is broken by the sudden entry of Jack Tenney. Wild-eyed and dishéveled, he makes his way to the judge's bench and declares William Sherman innocent. In a few words he gives the true story of Frank Craig's death, and then falls dead in the arms of the sheriff.

The Manufacturer and the Copyright.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

WE are indebted to Mr. Thorvald Solberg, register of copyrights, for Circular Number Seven, which gives the rulings as to the registration of copyright under the amended law, in so far as they refer to the registration of motion picture films. Photoplay writers will please note that this circular refers to the produced film and not to photoplay scripts, which are in another classification.

Under the act of August 24, 1912, two classes and four classifications are recognized: "Motion picture photoplays" and "motion pictures and other than photoplays," and in each class the classification "not reproduced in copies for sale" and "reproduced in copies for sale."

The exact wording is a trifle confusing, for the copyright law comprehends as "copies for sale" any sale or public distribution. It is a nice question whether the practice of the constituents of the Motion Picture Patents Company in merely leasing and not selling its product will bring the film under the classification of for sale or not for sale, but we gather that the register, anticipating this question, has practically settled it in adding in parenthesis after "when a motion picture has been published (i. e., placed on sale or publicly distributed)," and this public distribution under lease would seem to act as a sale within the meaning of the act.

Accepting this to be the fact, this, then, is the situation: If a motion picture photoplay, or pictured dramatic performance, is to be entered for copyright, the notice of copyright as provided by the earlier act must appear upon each film. The simplest form is to simply state that the subject is "Copyright, 1912," or whatever the year. This must appear on the film. If greater precaution is desired each frame may be marked by a C within a circle and the date, the date as to the owner of the copyright appearing in the title or on the leaders, preferably on title and leaders, though the single announcement on the title length will be sufficient.

If the copy is not intended for release; if it is to be used by one person as a part of a lecture or exhibition or where but one copy is in active public use, it is not released for sale. It is sufficient in such a case that a printed or typewritten description (preferably the standard photoplay form), be deposited with one photograph from each scene of the photoplay. In motion pictures other than photoplays it is sufficient that two frames from the film be registered for identification, though more may be so registered and it is to be preferred that one frame from each portion of the subject be registered.

Photoplays in film must be accompanied by a registration fee of one dollar either in currency, money order or express order, though those regularly doing business with the Copyright Office may make an advance deposit sufficient to cover registration within a reasonable period; a fact not stated in the circular, but well known to those doing business regularly with the Copyright Office.

In addition to the fee and the registered material, there is required an application card in accordance with the subject. For a motion picture photoplay not reproduced in copies for sale, application must be made on Form L 2, and in copies for sale on Form L 1. In motion pictures other than photoplays (scenics, industrials, etc.), the forms should be M 2 for copies not offered for sale and Form M 1 for copies offered for sale.

Where copies are offered for sale (i. e., released), two complete copies of the film must accompany the application. These may be on positive paper of positive film, but they must show every frame in the finished release. Scenes from the play or two or more frames from the film apply only to those subjects not released for sale or publication.

It is interesting to note that this law offers only the single change that photoplays or other motion pictures not intended for sale may be registered by frames instead of the finished print. Apart from that the law simply directs that Mr. Solberg do precisely what he has been doing under the authority granted him by the earlier act. Almost a year ago The Moving Picture World called attention to the fact that this registration could be obtained. So far as published prints are concerned, the amendment merely establishes a special class for photoplays.

The new law does not in any sense release the manufacturer from the obligation of depositing two complete copies of the print intended for sale. It merely prescribes a new class for such deposits.

Such deposits may remain the property of the Library of Congress for the use of that library or others designated by law, or may be returned to the maker, after proper entry, under the sanction of the Librarian of Congress. In general practice the prints are returned within a few weeks and this time may be shortened, we think, if the need for quicker action is properly presented to Mr. Solberg. Speaking unofficially, he has stated to the writer that these prints can in ordinary cases be returned to the maker within a week.

It should be noted that the law is not retroactive. If the subject has been published it cannot now be copyrighted. The law requires that the notice of copyright be imprinted upon all copies and that immediately after publication the copies be deposited with the registration fee. Notice of copyright must appear upon all prints and a reissue of an uncopyrighted subject cannot be copyrighted.

Encouraging Educationals.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

IT is quite true that educationals do not pay to-day; it is equally true, however, that they ought to pay and pay well. Why don't they? Simply because they are being handled in the wrong way. The educational is produced, released and exhibited exactly as if it were an ordinary photoplay, and the two are different and distinct in everything except a superficial resemblance and the fact that each may at times be used to accomplish the purposes of the other. One is a means of amusement, the other is a tool for teaching; one is intended to stimulate and thrill, the other is designed to make a lasting impression. The ordinary photoplay depends for its effect on novelty and change, the educational on repetition and permanency. Both, however, are being handled as a mode of pastime and instrument of entertainment, and the inevitable result has come about that the exchange and educator are crying that educationals don't pay, while the manufacturer and exhibitor are more or less confident that they ought to pay, and the outside spectator expresses his liking and appreciation of them. On the one hand, there is a general discouragement and unwillingness to handle, and on the other there is a constantly increasing production and a persevering multiplicity of experiments. The result is disastrous, and what is wanted is some practical scheme that will solve the problem and put the educational end of the business on the same solid, sane and paying basis as the amusement end.

The ordinary photoplay owes its marvellous popularity and success to the fact that it has been developed logically and properly as an amusement proposition by men experienced and skilled in that line of business. The educational moving picture can be made just as popular and successful if it is handled in a similar way. This doesn't necessarily mean that a body of high-priced and expert educators be put in charge of this part of the business; but it does mean that the educational must be treated in the right, not in the wrong way, and must be given a chance to grow according to its own nature and genius. The trouble is that the moving picture business has two children with entirely different constitutions and gifts, and it is trying to bring up both of them by the same discipline and training. In consequence one child is thriving and developing rapidly, while the other is still puny and stunted.

The ordinary photoplay, like the theatrical production, has only one season or inning. To be a success it must make its effect, it must pay, once for all, and then give way to something else, something new. It is good only for the time being; it cannot be repeated with success except in some rare instance. On the other hand the usefulness of an educational is destroyed only when the film is worn out or the subject is replaced by a better release. In other words, the moving pictures are like books. The ordinary photoplay, like the novel, is read once and then cast aside. Educationals, like other books, are read and reread over and over until their contents are mastered or until some other better text-book on the same subject takes their place. Hence, while the educational may not make as much money as an ordinary photoplay at first, it can afford to be content with less initial profit, because it will more than make up the difference in the end in as much as each repetition adds its own gain. The modern public library system is the answer to the publishers' question as to how money could be made out of non-fiction books; a similar scheme should be feasible with regard to the moving picture, because if the films are books, the manufacturer is the publisher, the exchange the library, the exhibitor the librarian, the educator the reader who takes out the books to use in study and teaching. All that is needed to inaugurate such a project is that manufacturer, exchange and exhibitor be willing to co-operate in putting up the necessary time, money, energy and advertising.

This may seem like a big undertaking, but it is not so colossal after all. The plant and machinery are already in operation, even the present method of releasing and using educationals in the same way as ordinary photoplays can be used to great advantage as advertising. All that is needed is the devising of some method by which a sufficient number of copies of each educational shall be kept accessible for use by educators for, say, a year or two after their release. As to this also the General Film Company has already made a beginning in its educational department. As a matter of fact, therefore, nothing more is needed than to put the present machinery into effective operation. Experience, however, has proven that the General Film's educational department needs revision and expansion. You can't get the films you want when you want them, sometimes not even at all. This is not from any lack of willingness, but from inability. To remedy this the department should keep a special list of the whereabouts of every educational film and see to it that either in the New York office or in one or more of the branch exchanges there is a sufficient number of extra copies of each educational to supply the demand for that particular film. If a system of inter-exchange loans similar to the inter-library loan system now used by the public libraries be adopted, one or at most two such extra copies would probably fill the demand for the next six months, and by that time sufficient data would have accumulated for a more accurate estimate to be made. The main point just now, however, is not the number of films obtainable, but the necessity that whatever films are listed shall be accessible, and that educationals released in the future shall be kept accessible in at least fair condition for at least one year from date.

If this is done, the only other thing necessary to create a constantly increasing demand for educationals will be to show the educator what films he can get, and it is here that the exhibitor can and is doing good work. He can do better, however. When an exhibitor knows he is going to have an educational, let him see to it that the parson, religious workers, school teachers, librarians, and others, as for example the literary societies, the Christian and social settlement associations, etc., know that it is coming, and also know something about the character of the film. Then let him invite representatives of the people most interested in that particular class of film to his exhibition. By doing this the ordinary release of the educational can be made into a salesman's demonstration of his wares as well as an advertisement of the exhibitor's own theater. And if he wants in the surest way to make picture fans out of these folks and the people who swear by them, he has only to go one step further: Scrape acquaintance with them, find out or suggest to them ways they can use the educationals to further their own work, put them in touch with his exchange and his exchange in touch with them.

Finally, if the manufacturers and exchanges will back up the exhibitors by supplying him with proper educational advertising matter and by sending such advertising to persons whom the exhibitor recommends or says he cannot reach, there is no earthly reason why a year from now should not see the educational bringing in a handsome if not a princely return on the capital invested and the energy expended. The exhibitor will be more than repaid in increased box office receipts and an enthusiastic and better clientele; the exchanges will be netting a good profit on the films they are now unwilling to handle; the manufacturers will be making and also selling more copies of each film than they are now doing. Besides a more adequate supply of film for the serious work of education, there will be a steadily increasing demand for educationals to be used in that kind of work; the foundations of a practical, paying means of supplying that demand will have been established, and the educational moving picture will have taken its place on a safe, sound, sane business basis as a distinct, integral and profitable part of the business. The dwarfed and puny baby will have become a normal, healthy, growing child. The educational has already shown what it can do with half a chance; does it get a whole one?

Ambrosio in America.

WITH a desire of getting in closer touch with the market for motion pictures in America, the Ambrosio Company, of Turin, Italy, has established an American branch in New York City. The new establishment will be conducted as a separate company and has been incorporated as the Ambrosio American Company, with Mr. M. A. Stevani as president and manager, and offices have been secured at 15 East 26th Street, New York.

In effecting the work of organization, Mr. Alfredo Gandolfi, managing director of the Ambrosio Company of Turin, and vice-president of the American company, came to New York about two weeks ago, and remained in the city long enough to complete the necessary formalities. A representative of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD met Mr. Gandolfi at the company's offices and learned something of his plans. Those who have the pleasure of Mr. Gandolfi's acquaintance will recognize him instantly from the accompanying engraving, for it is an excellent likeness.

Regarding the Ambrosio Company Mr. Gandolfi said:

"The actual output of our company is now four (4) releases per week, and has been at that point for some time past. We make only the finest work, and to increase our present output would make the standard quality suffer. In consideration of the big demand for features, we intend to produce some wonderful examples of the moving picture art, and for this purpose we find that the two studios are not sufficient to do the extra work satisfactorily. We are now building a new plant which will be, when completed, the largest and most perfectly equipped in the world. The photos give a very good idea of the general appearance of the factories. The dimensions of the new studio are: 164 feet in length, 107 feet wide, and 66 feet high, having a floor space of 60,000 square feet."

MR. ALFREDO GANDOLFI.

THE WORLD reproduces in the illustration at the top of this page an excellent view of the studio in question. In this immense structure, Mr. Gandolfi explained, the six companies of players now in the employ of the Ambrosio Company could work at once. The entire producing force is under the direct personal supervision of Mr. Ambrosio himself.

Mr. Gandolfi contended that most of the biggest productions in motion pictures since the beginning of the art had been produced by Mr. Ambrosio, and named such masterpieces in support of his contention as "The Last Days of Pompeii," "The Perjurer," "Nero," "The Slave of Carthage," "Virgin of Babylone," "Silent Piano," "Roland the Grenadier," "The Golden Wedding," and, more recently, "The Ship," together with others from the pen of the world-famous poet and dramatist, Gabrielle D'Annunzio. The quality of the productions above mentioned is well known to readers of THE WORLD and the trade in America. With the new facilities for production there is a reasonable certainty that the Ambrosio quality will always remain as good.

Mr. Gandolfi expressed himself well pleased with the result of his visit to America, and said that he returned home with the best impressions of the American market. He expects to return in the very near future to inaugurate work of much greater importance than that just completed. In the meantime the affairs of the Ambrosio American Company will be conducted by Mr. Stevani, who is well known to buyers in this market.

It was also announced that Ambrosio subjects would be released through the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

"ARABIAN INFAMY" (Ambrosio).

THIS is a thrilling story. It is a story that holds you tight after the first three minutes. The writer saw the picture without titles, but that discrepancy affected not the least the coherency or the intelligibility of the drama. Entirely apart from the high dramatic quality, the picture would easily carry on the strength of the beautiful, artistic tinting of some of the scenes. That, for instance, where the Arab is invited by the wife of the officer to join her in a stroll through the grounds: A pale green glow on the waters of the lily-padded stream; the arched foot-bridge, flower-decked; and the gardens where the indiscreet Arab guest declares his love for the wife of his host.

On the dramatic side perhaps one of the strongest scenes is where the Arab, his advances rejected by his hostess, who has left him standing alone by the lake, impressively and powerfully pours out his wrath. The chief value of this picture, however, will rest in the featuring of three lions and a great hound.

The story opens with a gathering of Arabs in a hut in a desert. There are rifles about, tied in bundles. These are lowered through a great trap door, designed apparently for the luring of the King of Beasts. There is an abundance of straw matting placed against the walls for laying over the hole. The leader of the Arabs is reading an invitation to visit an army post across the desert as the guest of the commander.

Scene from "Arabian Infamy" (Ambrosio).

The scene shifts and we are introduced to a party of English officers. In the center is the great hound. The Arab is introduced, and he salaams. He is accompanied by a retinue of a half dozen. Then the wife of the commander, accompanied by her little daughter, joins the party, and she also is introduced to the guest. With the object of showing hospitality to the visitor she invites him to accompany her on an inspection of the grounds. The two stroll along the shores of a walled stream, over a foot-bridge and enter the gardens. The Arab is plainly smitten. To his little attentions the wife smiles and treats the matter as a joke. Her manner changes suddenly, however, when the guest puts his arm about the waist of his hostess. She rebukes the Arab and walks away. The guest plainly shows his rage at his rebuff. His vengeance is rapid.

The Arab summons two of his men and sends them on an errand. A moment later the little daughter of the family enters the garden, accompanied by a servant. Two Arabs seize the latter. The chief picks up the child and runs. The next scene is of the start of six Arab horsemen, the chief leading with the child. The servant has informed his master of the kidnapping, and immediately four horsemen start in pursuit. It is a stirring chase. The horses are all under the lash. The mother, however, is determined to be in the hunt. She takes the great hound to the scene of the kidnapping and the trail is started. The hound leads off, the horse following.

As the half-dozen Arabs come to a stream a fellow-countryman comes to the shore and takes from the chief the child The Arabs continue their flight. The pursuers have not seen the transfer of the custody of the child and follow after them. The child is taken, unconscious with terror, into the hut at the edge of the desert and laid on the floor at the side of the great open trap. At first thought the Arab is going to throw the child into the pit. He changes his mind, however. The door is left open. The Arab shrugs his shoulders and walks out. The design is plain. It is intended that the child shall be the prey of the beasts that roam the vicinity. The Arabs, however, have not counted on the instinct of another animal rapidly nearing the hut, followed by the determined mother.

As the hound reaches the stream he bounds over the rocks in the path of the Arab who carried the child. The mother leaps to the ground and follows the great dog straight to the hut. She enters the open door and finds her child, now conscious and sitting up, crying. There is a fond reunion. The happiness of the mother is short-lived. She hears an ominous roar—a sound only too familiar to her. Quickly she closes the door, but the means of securing it are inadequate. One of the three lions comes to the door, raises on his hind legs and peers in. The mother and child crouch in terror. The lion begins to jump up against the door; he puts a forepaw through a hole in the frail defense and tries to pry it open. Another lion joins in the assault.

The mother looks about for means of escape. Taking the straw she covers the trap and goes into the next room and throws the bolt into the door. The lions finally break through, and one is seen falling into the pit as the straw yields under his weight. As the lions have entered the room where the trap is situated, the mother sees the hound jump through a window. Taking the child she follows. She finds her horse at the stream and makes her escape over the route taken by the Arabs and the pursuing officers.

In the meantime the officers have overtaken the kidnappers. The commander of the post has a pistol at the head of his former guest and is trying to make him reveal the hiding place of his daughter. One of the party glances up and sees the approaching mother and child, with the hound loping along in advance. There is great rejoicing. The Arabs are permitted to depart. The father takes his wife and child in his arms.

AN ANIMATED DAILY.

Universal Company Announces the Early Release of Picture of Daily Events.

A bit of enterprise that will commend itself to the exhibitor is announced by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company in the form of an "animated daily." The new feature will consist of about two hundred feet of film showing the latest news events, specially selected by Mr. Aubrey M. Kennedy, who has had charge of that branch of the Universal work for the past few months.

Through Mr. Kennedy's efforts the camera force of the Animated Weekly has been increased and advantageously placed. Negatives have been coming in rapidly, and have been of such excellent quality and value that the issue of a Daily Animated has become possible. A tremendous amount of effort has been required to bring this condition about, but the Universal people feel that the end will justify the extra labor and expense entailed.

There seems to be no doubt of the success of the enterprise, for orders have been received already from a majority of the exchanges using the Universal service.

R. E. Gumm, of the Cloquet Amusement Co., Cloquet, Minn., has purchased the Majestic Theater in Duluth, and changed its name to the Diamond. The Diamond has been remodeled. It will be managed by Mr. Gumm. The program at the Diamond consists of four first run pictures daily, of the Film Supply Co.'s make.

N. Smith, manager of the Royal Feature Film Co., Chicago, announces that his shipments of films from Europe are now arriving, and that he is booking them as fast as they pass inspection. The Royal was organized several months ago, but owing to the fact that some of the firm's best films were delayed in transportation, the company has made little effort to announce themselves to the trade. Manager Smith is well known to exhibitors, having handled features for a long time.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

EFFORTS have been made recently in several quarters to run moving pictures free, using the presentations as an inducement to customers. Robert Knight, deputy building commissioner of Chicago, when seen the other day, stated that quite a number of merchants had attempted to exhibit moving pictures, but owing to the fact that the buildings in which they were to be projected did not comply with the building ordinances, a halt was immediately called.

An effort was made some time ago by the Shredded Wheat Co. of Niagara Falls, N. Y., to exhibit two reels of films free of charge in churches and halls. The plan, however, was unsuccessful. The Boston store, on State Street, and Wieboldt's department store on Milwaukee Avenue, attempted to construct a motion picture theater in their stores, but the building commissioner immediately stopped the work. It is not long since Indianapolis merchants announced that they would give outdoor exhibitions of moving pictures in that city, but when it came to the point of securing films, they found that none were to be had. Exhibitors should be on the lookout for all such encroachments on their special field. There is always a way to prevent selfish men from doing an injury to those who make a living by the exhibition of pictures.

Church Runs Rival Picture Show.

There is still a tendency to decry moving pictures, as shown in our theaters. Let our censorship be never so rigorous there will be always some one to cast a stone at picture theater programmes. The pity of it is that in such cases well meaning people hurt the theater of the poor. In the case under consideration, a Catholic priest gives the weight of his authority against picture theater programmes, although acknowledging that he has no personal knowledge of such programmes. Hearsay evidence is not accepted in any court nor by any fair-minded man. Why should it be accepted in the case treated of in the following news paragraphs:

Moving pictures as a spiritual aid to the parochial school children of Holy Family parish have been inaugurated at the Young Men's Sodality Hall in South May Street, Chicago.

The Rev. Father Thomas Nolan is the originator of the idea. Father Nolan is spiritual director of the sodality.

No admission fee will be charged to the moving picture shows, which will be given every Tuesday night during the school term.

The Holy Family Church, at West Twelfth and May Streets, familiarly called the Jesuit Church, is in the heart of the Ghetto. More than 50,000 Jews live within the confines of the parish. It is Chicago's "melting pot."

"Roman Catholic children of the Ghetto, like all other children, are frequent patrons of the moving picture show," said one of the priests. "I don't know from personal knowledge, but I have heard that some of these shows are not particular as to the class of films they produce. Wild West scenes and pictures of that description seem to predominate.

"Boys and girls of tender age go to these places, and they often see pictures that do them more harm than good."

Big Profits of J. D. Williams' Enterprises.

The Greater J. D. Williams Amusement Company of Sydney, Australia, is in a very prosperous condition, as is shown by the appended article from the Sydney Sun. It is gratifying to learn that the reports circulated in this country, not long ago, by people connected with a rival concern, had no foundation in facts.

"The half-yearly report of the Greater J. D. Williams Amusement Company has been issued. It deals with the transactions of the company from January 1 to June 30, 1912. The profit and loss account (which has been duly certified by the auditors) shows that the profits from all sources (excepting the Crystal Palace), including a balance of £8,713 4s 5d, brought forward from last year, and after, amount to £9,377 4s 8d. Out of this amount the directors declared a dividend of 1s 6d per share, absorbing £13,537 19s, leaving a balance which is carried forward of £9,377 4s 8d.

"This profit has been shown, the report states, after ample provision has been made for all bad and doubtful debts, and for depreciation of plant, machinery, furniture, etc., as well as the extinction of the book values of leaseholds. An important statement made is that the total cost of all films purchased and used during the half-year has been written off. This is a rather convincing answer to the frequently made assertion that the Greater J. D. Williams Company over-valued its films.

"'The profit from the Crystal Palace,' the report says, 'for the week ending June 29, which is not included in the foregoing figures, is estimated at £1,600, but the exact result, when ascertained, will be incorporated in the accounts to be made up to December 31. This result is considered quite exceptional, being the opening week's business.

"'During the half-year under review, about one-fourth of the entire capital of the company has earned practically nothing beyond the estimated profit of £1,600 from the Crystal Palace, inasmuch as the Crystal Palace was not opened until June 24, and the Britannia Theater until June 27 last.

"'The profits of the Crystal Palace and Britannia Theater since July 1 have been eminently satisfactory, while the revenue of all the other theaters has been fully maintained.

"'The film business is in a very satisfactory condition. The directors have recently secured the exclusive rights for American Biograph pictures throughout Australasia, and it is considered that this arrangement will help to place the film business on a still sounder basis.

"'The directors have practically concluded negotiations for the further extension of the company's operations.'"

Essanay Installs Projecting Room.

V. R. Day, manager of the Essanay city office, has installed a handsome, well-equipped private projecting room, for the special convenience of exhibitors who desire to view Essanay subjects run off in advance, in Suite 408-10 in the First National Bank Building. A Motiograph projecting machine is used and the pictures are thrown on one of the walls, which has been calcimined, a slight tinge of blue being given to the white surface of the screen.

The ventilation of the room is excellent, the air being kept fresh by two small exhaust fans in a large window leading to the area section of the building. The first private exhibition of pictures was given on Monday, September 16, and a large attendance of exhibitors marked the opening.

Chicago Film Brevities.

At the meeting held in Schiller Hall, on Monday, September 16, the members of the Chicago League appointed a committee to call on the various candidates for governor and have them go on record as being in favor of all kinds of legitimate amusements, including moving pictures. The report of the convention committee will not be ready until the next meeting, which will be held the first Monday in October. The full report will then be read.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

CALIFORNIA EXHIBITORS CONVENTION.

Officers State Branch No. 12, M. P. E. L.

The success of California State Branch No. 12 in securing the enrollment of practically all the Moving Picture exhibitors in the State is due to the efforts of these gentlemen and the able backing they have received from the members as a unit. All have been working for a perfect organization, and the result is encouraging to all. From left to right the officers are: (back row) Max Shirpser, treasurer; W. A. Cory, recording secretary; Chas. Rothchild, president; A. R. Oberle, vice-president; R. Marks, director; (front row) D. W. Riordon, sergeant at arms; N. K. Herzog, financial secretary; J. McCauley, director.

Chairmen of Committees of First State Convention, State Branch No. 12.

The destiny of California State Convention is in the hands of several committees, the chairmen of which are pictured above. Their names are, reading from left to right: (back row) Max Shirpser, arrangements; R. L. Marks, badges and printing; Chas. Rothchild, president; W. A. Cory, concessions; Charlie Maio, transportation; Joe Huff, publicity; (front row) Chas. A. Neal, State organizer; Sol. Lesser, entertainment; Frank Carpenter, secretary of Convention.

Each and every member of the Convention committee has used his utmost endeavors to complete the duties assigned him, and as the Convention date draws near its success in every particular seems assured.

SPRINGFIELD, MO., LOCAL HAS BANQUET.

The first of a series of informal conferences over the banquet board was held by the Springfield Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at the Sansome Hotel, Springfield, Mo., Thursday evening, Sept. 5. Nearly every member present answered with a short informal talk on subjects of interest to the exhibitors.

N. J. Cunningham of the Jefferson theater, spoke on "Convention Funds," and discussed with the members various plans for raising money for the entertainment of the State convention of the picture men in June of next year. R. F. Barrett, a member of the State executive committee, and manager of the "Happy Hour" theater, spoke on "The Coming Convention." Mr. Barrett has been a member of the league for a number of years.

Gus Bennert talked on the important question of "Dead Heads." Lee D. Balsley of the Aladdin addressed the little gathering on music. Frank Lloyd of the Princess theater also spoke.

Among the guests present at the banquet were Phil Pfenning, new manager of the Landers theater, Captain Peabody of the People's theater, Judge John G. Newbill, representing "The Thespian," a theatrical journal at Kansas City and R. W. Emery of the Merchants Amusement company. Manager Pfenning made a short talk on "Organization" and Captain Peabody spoke on the "Advancement of Moving Pictures in Springfield." Judge Newbill made an interesting and witty talk on "Educational Features in Motion Pictures." Jerome Dickerson, a member of the league, was also present.

The league has members in nearly every part of the State.

PASSAIC EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

At a meeting called on Thursday, September 12th, by State Organizer William S. Martin of New Jersey, to affiliate Passaic County with the National Exhibitors' League of America, New Jersey branch; Mr. G. A. Robinson, president of the State organization, and Mr. Louis F. Blumenthal, national vice-president of New Jersey, appeared and formed a permanent organization of Passaic County. Mr. Robinson addressed the meeting on the benefits of organization and the necessity of getting together. Mr. Blumenthal told the members of the great work accomplished at the Chicago convention and instilled great enthusiasm and interest by informing them of the many great and good things that were on the road to speedy accomplishment. The following officers were elected: President, Mr. William Daly.

Vice-President, Mr. Max Gold.
Treasurer, Mr. Adam Adams.
Secretary, Mr. Samuel Stratton.
State Vice-President, Mr. W. J. Montgomery.

The following committee was appointed to draft the constitution and by-laws: Mr. Henry Fleigh, Mr. Peter Johnston, Mr. W. J. Montgomery.

The next meeting was called for Monday, September 23rd, at 12 o'clock noon, at Mr. Gold's Lyric Theater, Main Street, Paterson, which all the exhibitors in Passaic County were requested to attend. After brief addresses for the good and welfare of the organization the meeting adjourned. A meeting of the Essex County exhibitors will be called at Newark, Thursday, September 26th, at 12 o'clock noon. Any exhibitors of the State of New Jersey wishing to form locals in their county will kindly communicate with Mr. L. F. Blumenthal, 30 Union Square, New York City.

ORGANIZING ESSEX COUNTY, N. J.

On Thursday, September 26, at 12 o'clock noon, there will be held at No. 12 Deen Street, Newark, N. J., a meeting of the motion picture exhibitors of Essex County, N. J. The meeting has been arranged by the State organizer, Mr. Martin, acting under authority from the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New Jersey. The meeting will be held for the purpose of effecting a permanent organization in Essex County, which includes Newark, Bloomfield, Montclair, the Oranges, etc. The Essex organization will be affiliated with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Mr. G. A. Robinson, president of the New Jersey State League, and Mr. Louis F. Blumenthal, national vice-president from New Jersey, will be present at the meeting.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA TO HAVE NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

Mr. William L. Woodin, formerly manager of the Orpheum Theater, Orwigsburg, Pa., and the Lyceum Theater, Montgomery, Pa., will be the manager and proprietor of a new moving picture house to be built at Schuykill Haven, Pa. The house, when completed, will have a seating capacity of 500.

"Leah, the Forsaken" (Imp).

Reviewed by Lewis Reeves Harrison.

WHILE this attractive adaptation by Mr. Herbert Brenon affords opportunity for some fine acting and exhibits exceptional taste in the selection of many exteriors, its educational value is not high. The Anti-Semiticism of the Middle Ages was very largely the result of Jesuitical hostility, and in many cases where the Jews were persecuted it was not because of their religion, but on account of certain racial characteristics, such as clannishness and lack of civilized social feeling, which they preserve in many cases to this day.

Jews are elected and appointed to posts of honor and importance in this country, but these are exceptional men who have come to realize that the distinguishing spirit of this time is its ascendant impulse, the mightiest social asset in our country. It was claimed in Prussia and Austria that the Jews were responsible for fraudulent business methods, and that the hatred of other races than their own was a menace to any community in which they dwelt. In consequence, their voluntary segregation made it easy to accuse them as a body for the crimes of individuals.

Vivian Prescott in "Leah, the Forsaken" (Imp).

They were simply weak groups living in a world where might was right, and the stronger Gentiles treated them in a manner that would have been impossible had they amalgamated with the communities they invaded.

The photoplay deals with some cruel phases of human nature, but its villain is one of the tribe, though he is one who has forsaken the sect to which he formerly adhered, the one referred to in the cast as the Apostate. His acting is strong; Abraham is intense; Rudolph is able and consistent; Lorenzo is delightful, and Leah is admirably portrayed. The company seemed to work in fine harmony, a fact that speaks well for the author-director.

CAST OF CHARACTERS.

Leah	Vivian Prescott
Nathan, the Apostate	Ed. J. LeSaint
Abraham	Frank Smith
Sarah	Louise Crolius
Rudolph	Wm. E. Shay
Lorenzo, his father	Wm. Welch
Madeleine, his fiancée	Grace Lewis

The action begins with the stoning of Jews as they are driven out of a small Prussian or Austrian community by the village people. Blind Abraham and his wife with their young child are the greatest sufferers, and to them Leah gives her spontaneous sympathy. Nathan is driven to desperation and renounces his religion. He packs his small belongings and escapes alone to a more friendly country. There he renounces his old faith and secures a position as an instructor, thereby gaining the respect and confidence that enable him to live in peace. Among his new friends are Rudolph and his father and the young girl, Madeleine, selected by Lorenzo to be his son's wife.

Leah wanders in hopeless misery with Abraham and Sarah until they reach the country where Nathan has found refuge by an alteration in the form of his faith, but the prejudice against Jews is so great there that signs are posted in various parts of the province forbidding them to remain overnight within its boundaries. Beneath one of these notices weary Sarah sinks down in despair. They are first discovered by humane Madeleine, the Burgomaster's daughter, and offered assistance. She attempts to give them shelter, but the news that there are Jews within the province has reached the people, and Nathan is first to urge drastic measures against the unfortunates. Leah is pursued by the infuriated populace until she reaches the market place, where Madeleine makes a vain effort to preserve her from mob assault. The young Jewess is struck down just as the village priest comes on the scene, and he is compelled to invoke the Power Supreme to prevent further violence.

Rudolph now arrives, and is so deeply impressed by the beauty of Leah that he follows her to where Sarah and Abraham are resting. When she goes to a nearby stream for water, he follows closely and offers to assist her. He conducts the unfortunate to a hut belonging to his father, and establishes his manliness by providing them with shelter and nourishment. Leah is profoundly affected and soon becomes fascinated by Rudolph, making an appointment to meet him near a great cross that is set up in the forest.

There are some dramatic moments at this cross. There is lighted the flame of love that is never extinguished in Leah's heart. There the lovers are discovered by Nathan, who now hates his own race, and who is responsible for the communication made to Lorenzo concerning his son's prospective misalliance. The scenes ensuing in Lorenzo's library are especially effective.

On a stormy night, when Rudolph has an engagement to meet Leah at the cross, Nathan arouses Lorenzo to a state of ungovernable fury by his revelations. When Rudolph appears on his way to keep his engagement with Leah he is confronted by his father in a terrific rage. The son admits his intention to marry Leah. His faith in her is not shaken when Nathan claims to know that she is a calculating woman who is merely looking forward to what she can gain by the alliance. Nathan offers to prove his statement that no Jewess would marry a Gentile except for gain—like any of her race, she has her price. Lorenzo proposes to put this to the test by sending Nathan with a large sum to buy Leah's renunciation, and his son consents.

We are given some startling scenes of Leah at the cross, waiting in a torrent of rain, while Nathan goes to the hut and induces impoverished Sarah to sign Leah's name to a paper renouncing further claims on Rudolph. He returns with this paper, and his villainy triumphs. Rudolph's love turns to hate in the wink of an eyelash—all this is very theatrical—while the lightning kills Abraham for no obvious purpose and continues to give us glimpses of Leah clinging to the cross. She is soaked through, but not tired of waiting, until the storm is over.

There is an affecting scene when she goes to the door of her lover's house, only to be rejected without explanation, and another when she sees him on his way to church with pretty Madeleine on his arm to be married, but it is a hard strain on modern common sense to present a lover turned from the natural dictates of his heart upon viewing a paper purporting to come from his sweetheart although he is unfamiliar with her signature. It will do—it will have to do—for plays of this kind, but the venerable device estranges sympathy from the victim.

Leah's life is over, so far as happiness is concerned, but she returns to the scene of her love in after years, only to be persecuted anew. She seeks shelter in a garden where Madeleine and her child are playing, and is again saved at a critical moment by the opportune arrival of Rudolph with a government edict permitting Jews to reside on the face of the earth. Rudolph and Madeleine beg Leah to make her home with them, but the flame of her first love burns true; she cannot remain in honor while loving the husband of Madeleine, so she bids them adieu, and the last we see of her she has started out, her face to the rising sun, on a long journey to the land of her people.

Theatre Men In Pictures

By Robert Grau.

THERE is so much discussion at the present time anent the activity in the moving picture field of such prominent factors as the Frohmans and the Shuberts, together with many of their colleagues from the distinctly theatrical field that the writer has been tempted to express himself as to the significance of the movement which will undoubtedly grow in force and numbers despite the fact that these gentlemen were not so long ago wont to regard the theater of science and invention as wholly unworthy of their consideration.

There is, however, nothing to indicate that the advent of the other class of amusement managers in the newer industry will create any great upheaval at this late day. Moreover, it is extremely unlikely that the experienced and practical men who have labored persistently to raise the level of their artistic offerings on the screen and who are at this time giving not the least indication of any retrograde movement, will capitulate to the newcomers, nor are they likely to emulate the latter in their policy which seems plainly enough to be an effort to induce the more notable stellar figures of the speaking stage to make the excursion from the two-dollars-a-seat playhouse to the film studio with more or less grace and dignity.

For all things a reason can be found, hence if Mr. Shubert is now partial to the photo-play it is because he has seen the problems of many of his theaters throughout the country solved by the camera man. Mr. Frohman was equally impressed when the exclusive and fashionable Lyceum Theater, after housing failure after failure, was kept open several months in mid-summer, profitably, with moving pictures; and Messrs. Erlanger, Brady, Woods and Cort, all of whom are interested in film enterprises, must have got their inspiration from the spectacle of the Kinemacolor film productions drawing $10,000 to the box office of the New York Theater in a single week, at a time when three playhouses in the heart of the theater zone were dark, while the gross receipts of three others combined did not amount to half as much as the sum above quoted.

But perhaps the greatest incentive provided for the theatrical producers was the amazing début in filmdom of the greatest living exponent of dramatic art—the divine Sarah Bernhardt and her most distinguished confrère, Gabrielle Réjane, thus perpetuating for future generations their consummate artistry in what is generally conceded to be the classics of the French stage, "Camille," and "Madame Sans Gêne."

Here in our own country two of the most distinguished players, Blanche Walsh and Nathaniel Carl Goodwin, Jr., have become photo-players, and in the case of Mr. Goodwin we are brought to realize the importance of the film of "Oliver Twist" by the calamity which befell him at the time of this writing, but it cannot be said that the "stars" of the speaking stage are destined to become the stars of the silent drama; and the millions of new playgoers who were attracted to the photo-playhouses by the artistic achievements of the Maurice Costellos, the John Bunnys, the Florence Turners and the Alice Joyces will be most reluctant to welcome the celebrities of theaterdom in their places. Surely the "stars" will have to bring more than their fame with them when they seek to reign in filmdom; as a matter of fact, the photo-players who have become potent were as a rule peculiarly qualified to cope with the philosophy and technique of the silent drama, and such of these as have had careers on the speaking stage were by no means as conspicuous or as successful in the older field of public entertaining.

Already more than one stellar light who was wont to hold sway in the bright light district and whose name has been emblazoned there for years as a sight draft on the public purse has "come a cropper" in short order when seeking conquests in the film studio.

But of course there are many plays and players that have brought great prosperity to the speaking stage that would greatly enhance the roster and repertoire of the Edisons, the Vitagraphs, etc., but who shall say that the theatrical manager entering the new field to-day is better qualified to select these than the well-organized forces of the modern film producing company.

Mr. Selig knew his book pretty well when he selected Mabel Taliaferro for the "Cinderella" film, and he was not wanting in perspicacity when he invited McKee Rankin to transfer "The Danites" and "The Forty-Niners" to the moving picture screen. In the same sense the indefatigable Vitagraph Company needed no prompting from "Rialto" wise men when they secured that great artiste, Rose Coghlan, to perpetuate on the screen the greatest of her portrayals—"Rosalind." Could any theatrical producer select a more appropriate subject than "Rip Van Winkle" for our children's children to rave over; and having selected this enobling legend, could Mr. Frohman better the Vitagraph's selection of Robert McWade for the title role? Right here let me digress to state that in my humble opinion the timeliness of the N. C. Goodwin and Robert McWade film productions reflects great credit on those who are responsible for the offerings.

The theatrical season of 1912-13 has started none too well. It is a well-known fact in managerial sanctums that another such season as that of 1911-12 would bankrupt even the few producers who by reason of their realty holdings (for theaters are valuable even when operated at a loss) were able to survive. Therefore it is not surprising in view of what has gone before that an effort should be made by these gentlemen to intrench themselves in the gold-laden industry that they not so long ago regarded as beneath their notice.

Let us hope, though, that among the few producers of the speaking stage who are still important factors in their own field and who are about to tempt fate with the silent drama, there will be revealed a few who will achieve in the film field such a record as that now to the credit of the men who have survived prejudice and who have so persistently uplifted a new art that even those most affected by the evolution of the moving picture, and who were the last to recognize its artistic value, are at last attracted to invest their capital in the hope of replenishing their fallen fortunes.

HARRY SOLTER ON VACATION.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company is desirous of contradicting rumors to the effect that Mr. Harry Solter is no longer connected with that company. One of the heads of the Universal Company stated to a Moving Picture World reporter that Mr. Solter is at present taking a vacation to look after some private business matters, and that he will be back at the studio when he gets ready to return. Mr. Solter is the producer of the Victor films in which Miss Florence Lawrence is being featured. Mr. Giles R. Warren is directing the Victor productions in Mr. Solter's absence.

Talking About Motion Picture Opera—Unique Theater Advertising—Brevities.

THE little group of optimists who have been insisting all along that it is only a matter of time before the picture play will take its place among the highest and most dignified of the arts—and the list includes several writers whose names are familiar to regular readers of The Moving Picture World—may take encouragement and vindication from the announcement, now made for the first time, that a serious attempt to create a motion picture opera is under way in this city.

The project is being undertaken under exceptionally favorable auspices and there is every possibility that it may open up an entirely new field of art. Of the two men who are collaborating in it one is a professional writer of fifteen years' experience who has created several dramas and has sufficiently mastered the technique of the photoplay to market a number of scripts. The other is a composer of note who studied in Italy under Verdi, was for years director of an important grand opera company, and has written three operas, two of which have been successfully produced. Many of his minor compositions have been published and are well known among musicians. A third man who is indirectly interested in the venture is a high official in a motion picture company whose brand is known wherever there are picture theaters. After the motion picture opera is completed he expects to take it and see if it can be made commercially practicable.

The subject which has been chosen is essentially poetic with a strain of mysticism running through it. Much use is to be made of the leading motif in the score. The expectation is that it will require five reels of film for its presentation.

I have talked to the men who are engaged in this work, but they are not willing to have their identities disclosed until the opera is far enough advanced to make certain that it stands even chances of being successful.

The score is being conceived orchestrally and will be written for a symphony orchestra, the parts corresponding to the voice parts being given to the cello and the French and English horns, but one of the plans now under consideration is the preparation of a piano score to make it available for theaters not able to support an orchestra. Another suggestion that has been under consideration is to release the films as a special feature, showing them in cities which have symphony orchestras in connection with the regular symphony concerts.

Activity In Selig Company.

The Selig company of which Hobart Bosworth is director is still at Bear Valley in the San Bernardino mountains making Indian and Western pictures. News from the valley is to the effect that they have been having light snow and intensely cold nights, but Bosworth went up with a certain amount of work laid out and evidently does not intend to let a little thing like cold weather drive him out until he is done.

Colin Campbell's company, which was roaming about the country, at Catalina and among the missions, has returned to the Edendale studio and is working on straight dramatic subjects.

Fred Huntley, who has been the third Selig producer in the Western studio, has been taking a rest. William N. Selig, head of the concern, arrived from Chicago September 6 bringing with him Lem B. Parker, a new producer who went to work the day after his arrival. He is the latest acquisition of the Selig company. It seems that he is well known as a playwright, and otherwise, in the legitimate field, and until Selig engaged him had been living in New York.

There is a rumor that his coming does not displace any of the three other producers, but that it means the formation of a fourth company at this studio. The report is neither denied nor confirmed at the studio, the only explanation being that the plans for the future are not in shape for definite announcement.

Kalem Makes Big War Picture.

Kalem's long deferred two reel subject "The Battle of Paardeburg" depicting one of the two big and critical battles of the Boer War, is to be produced at last. George Melford, director of the Kalem Glendale company, had planned to start it three months ago, but one obstacle after another arose to make postponement necessary. The last delay was caused by the war game at San Francisco, which took all the militia companies away from Southern California and made it impossible for Melford to get the several hundred soldiers he will need. The original suggestion for the picture, it will be remembered, grew out of General Price's discovery of a topical situation near Los Angeles which exactly duplicates the battlefield of Paardeburg. Price was engaged in the battle and will play the leading part in the production.

The Glendale company this week finished a full reel drama called "The Power of a Hymn." Melford says he thinks pretty well of it, which is a significant statement considering the fact that he is not in the habit of bragging about his work.

There have been no changes in the company for more than six months with the single exception of the engagement of Miss Christie as leading woman when Miss Marsh left. Six months with only one change in the organization is a record.

Horne's Unique Advertising.

A unique method of advertising his programs, which has been devised by W. T. Horne, proprietor of Horne's theater in the business district, is beginning to cause comment outside motion picture circles. Whenever he changes his program Horne hangs up in the lobby a couple of large placards giving what he calls "honest information" about what is to be found inside. The statements are so different from the kind other exhibitors are accustomed to make that people walk out of their way to pass the theater and see what Horne has to say about his program. Last week, for example, his bill included "Broncho Billy For Sheriff" and Selig's "Frenzied Finance." Concerning the first the announcement read: "An Essanay, of course. To patient patrons we would be glad to show the violent death of Broncho William, but you know Andy owns part of the Essanay company, so he must be a star or he won't play." The comment on the Selig was, "Taken in Los Angeles. We would like to know how much they received for advertising the Lawrence cafe."

The week before he had a program that he didn't like. "They are all rotten this week," his announcement read. "Come in and see how bad the manufacturers can be when they try." One might think that a warning of this kind would drive patrons away. As a matter of fact it seemed to help business, probably because it excited curiosity. Another unsatisfactory program brought forth the comment, "These reels were all wished on us. We didn't want them, but we couldn't help ourselves."

Brevities.

James Young Deer, director of the Pathe Western company, took 15 members of his company and went to Yama, Arizona, September 8, to be gone a week or more. His purpose is to make a drama dealing with the Yuma tribe of Indians. The Yumas are an industrial tribe who have long lived in a state closely approximating civilization. They have many unique customs and rites and a host of interesting legends. Deer, who is himself an Indian, though of another tribe and having besides the advantages of a college education, has been studying the Yuma lore and is now to make use of it.

Six out of nine of the principal theaters in Los Angeles this week are running motion pictures, and the theater goer who wants to avoid pictures really has only two chances out of nine, for one of the theaters, the Auditorium, is dark. The Empress, which is the Sullivan and Considine house, the Orpheum and Pantages are all showing one reel each as a part of their bills. The Grand is running motion pictures exclusively using Licensed programs. The Carnegie expedition Alaska-Siberia pictures are back at the Mason on their second engagement and are now in their sixth week. The Majestic, usually the home of the high class road companies, is showing the Paul Rainey African pictures. This town is getting to be a better motion picture town every day.

Los Angeles will be represented by at least seven delegates at the convention of the state association of motion picture men at San Francisco, September 16. A delegation left for the north the night of September 16, which included as official representatives Judge A. P. Tugwell, D. S. Markowitz, E. J. Tally, M. Stutz, G. H. McLain, R. W. Woodley, A. Wallenbreck and T. C. Jensen. Jensen went as an alternate to serve in case of the disability of any of the regular seven.

A discussion on motion picture theaters, from the viewpoint of the men who are interested in preventing and combating fires, is to be one of the features of the program of the convention which the fire chiefs of the Pacific coast will hold in this city September 13.

POWELL.

"At Old Fort Dearborn" (Universal Bison)

Reviewed by G. F. Blaisdell.

IN 1777 a colored man from San Domingo established himself as an Indian trader in what is now the city of Chicago. He built a square log house, which is by historians regarded as the beginning of the Windy City. In 1803 this house passed into the possession of John Kinzie, who thereby became the first American resident of the present Western metropolis. In the same year the government erected at the identical point a stockade in which were built two blockhouses. To these buildings was given the name of Fort Dearborn. In 1812 the commander of the fort received word from General Hull to forthwith evacuate the fort and proceed to Detroit and that his surplus stores should be divided among the friendly Indians. This action was necessitated by the outbreak of the War of 1812. On August 15 the soldiers and settlers left the fort. Within the limits of the present city the Indians set upon them and massacred the party. Two women and twelve children were among the killed. Two men who had been wounded were also slaughtered. The Indians then divided the plunder and burned the buildings. The fort was not rebuilt until 1816.

Scene from "At Old Fort Dearborn" (Universal-Bison).

The foregoing is history. The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has produced two reels entitled "At Old Fort Dearborn, or Chicago in 1812," in which this series of events is vividly portrayed by a big company, including a large band of Indians. Frank E. Montgomery was the man behind the guns, and in the opinion of those who saw the initial presentation of this film he has outdone his fine work in the "Santa Fe Trail." Mr. Montgomery evidently is a believer in the pictorial value of big areas—of spreading landscape—wherein the camera has wide sweep of knoll and plain. That the producer of these big Universal Bisons has struck a popular note is beyond question. The motion picture follower is essentially a member of a more or less closely settled community. To him these broad vistas peculiarly appeal.

In running back over the filmed story, there does not seem to be any one scene which stands out far above the others. In other words, "At Old Fort Dearborn" is an even production—uniform and speedy. There is a snap to the action which keeps the eye of the beholder right on the screen. The photography is excellent—in one of the large scenes so sharp that it reveals the traces of the mowing machine which had leveled the grass. If the stickler for realism take mild offense at this fact, he will have his consolation in the stereoscopic clearness of the picture.

Little Mona Darkfeather is the star of this production as Singing Bird, the daughter of Black Partridge, a Pottawatomie chief; she has a role that will prove to be a popular one—that of a friend of the soldiers. In this picture she accomplishes another of her remarkable vaulting mounts. It would be at least difficult offhand to name among the many accomplished riders in picturedom her peer as an all-round horsewoman. Very likely mature reflection would not bring the question any nearer solution. To Charles Bartlett, as Dan Rawlins, a renegade, falls the "heavy" work; he has plenty to do. He does it well. He rouses the Indians to real enthusiasm in his appeals to them.

The story opens inside the stockade at Fort Dearborn. Black Partridge visits Captain Heald. With the chief is his daughter. The chief has called to return to the White Father the Madison peace medal which he has worn as a token of amity with the whites. The Indian informs the commander of the fort that his people are out for war and that he cannot control them. While the Indian and soldiers are conversing, Rawlins, drunk, reels into the stockade and embraces Singing Bird. He promptly lands in the guard house, being taken away from the little Indian girl by Captain Heald. Rawlins sets to work to burrow his way out of the guardhouse, and very shortly accomplishes his escape. He appropriates a horse and is making fast time away from the fort when he falls into the hands of the Indians, who are on their way to the fort to avenge the insult to Singing Bird.

Rawlins loses no time in inciting the redmen against the whites. That, perhaps, is the most effective way of saving his own skin. He has been taken into their big camp; he addresses them with much vehemence. At the same time a relay Indian runner has arrived at the fort with word from General Hull that Fort Mackinaw, on an island in the straits between Lake Michigan and Lake Huron, has been captured by the English and Indians before the commander there had learned of the outbreak of the war between England and the United States. Captain Heald is directed to take his people to Detroit.

Rawlins has been successful in his harangues to the Indians. Singing Bird, under obligation to Captain Heald for his interposition in the drunken revelry of Rawlins and doubly antagonistic to that good-for-nothing, goes to Captain Heald to inform him of the situation. The commander does not take the warning seriously. Mr. Kinzie, the old settler, wiser in the ways of Indians, advises the captain to get away as soon as possible. Heald accepts the Indians' offer of a safe conduct. The soldiers and the settlers, accompanied by a delegation of Indians, pass out of the stockade and set out for their long journey.

The Indians under the leadership of Rawlins are on the watch for the caravan. As the whites begin to go into camp for the night, their great covered wagons forming in a circle, the signal is given and the attack begins. The redmen who had heretofore acted as a convoy now join their brothers in the assault on the whites. The battle is short, as the soldiers are greatly outnumbered. Captain Heald is taken prisoner. His wife is saved by Singing Bird, who has been following the band of Rawlins in the belief that mischief was brewing. The little Indian girl, by the use of a tomahawk on the chief who is trying to capture the wife of the commander, has been able to put Mrs. Heald, wounded, on the back of her pony and ride away with her. She leaves her in a tent in an isolated place and returns to the Indian village.

The Indians set fire to the fort and then return to camp. Captain Heald is bound to a stake by Rawlins, with some cuffing that might very well have been omitted. Singing Bird goes to Black Partridge and begs for Heald's freedom. The old chief has been opposed to the conflict with the whites, he has lamented the surrender of his peace medal, but he is too wise to sanction any such move. He refuses the request.

As night falls Rawlins places an Indian on guard over Heald. In the camp street the Indians are gathered in a circle, not many feet away from Heald. Singing Bird comes out of her tent with a water jug. The guard asks for a drink. The girl goes to a stream and fills the jug. Into the water she puts a poisonous plant. The redman drinks the water and is soon unconscious. Singing Bird takes his knife. The others are asleep. She cuts the bonds of Heald. The two leave the camp together and proceed to the tent where Mrs. Heald has been placed. Singing Bird guides them to a canoe and the three embark.

When Rawlins discovers that his prisoner has escaped, the prisoner who had been the instrument of placing him in the guardhouse and on whom he had fully expected to take more than ample revenge, he calls all available men in the camp for the pursuit. The trio are followed down to the water-front, and are discovered within gunshot. Singing Bird is wounded, but the captain and his wife are not struck. The Indians are left behind. The fugitives, after coming ashore, are found by soldiers from Fort Wayne. Singing Bird's wound is fatal. Just before her death she confides to Mrs. Heald that she loves the white chief. So the little red woman, like so many of her white sisters and like so many of the white sisters' brothers, had had her secret romance.

CINES AND ECLIPSE FEATURES.

With scenes set amid the picturesque surroundings of the French Court as it was in the seventeenth Century, "A Cavalier's Romance"—the Cines film to be released by George Kleine, Tuesday, September 24th—is a charming love idyll with gallant and richly costumed courtiers and beautiful noblewomen as the principal factors, and love, jealousy, bitter rivalry and the inevitable duel on the "field of honor" forming the theme and main action. Anthony Novelli, who is always especially fine in romantic drama, again appears as a valiant champion of the fair sex.

Of all the beauty spots of scenically magnificent Italy there is none fairer to look upon nor more interesting than the old, quaint and historic eighth century town of Castrovillari in Southern Italy, which has been finely pictured by Cines and added to complete the "Cavalier's Romance" reel.

Self-abnegation and a life's devotion form the basis around which the Eclipse picture-drama released Wednesday, September 25th, entitled "The Sacrifice," is built. Major Browning's renunciation for the sake of the little girl he found lying asleep in her dead mother's arms after the storm of the battle between his soldiers and the rioters had passed, teaches a sweet lesson of humility which cannot but be of benefit to all who view with finer appreciation this splendid film so ably presented by the capable Eclipse players assisted by a large company of supernumeraries.

George Gambard, who so humorously portrays the character of Mr. Stout in the Cines films, will be seen in the release of Saturday, September 28th, as a country yokel—a "come-on." As "Reuben" in "Reuben and the Boys," he plays the unsophisticated "boob" with a naturalness that is intensely amusing. He manages to interject into his interpretation just sufficient of the sublime faith popularly supposed to be held by all our country brethren in human nature. For a travel subject of supreme beauty and color, the short scenic that completes the above reel, "Quaint Sights in Sardinia," deserves the highest recommendation as a work of art, picturing as it does in the realistic colors of nature a delightful bit of the historic old world that is redolent with romantic interest. The habitations, customs and dress of the natives of strange countries have a pleasing fascination for people of all ages and climes.

MISS CLARA HORTON, OF ECLAIR.

No one in the past few months has more deservedly earned a paragraph of recognition and appreciation than this little "mite of a tike" whose picture we present herewith. Miss Clara Horton is but eight years of age. Before her entry into the photoplay she was engaged in dancing for society entertainments. She has never appeared on the regular stage and her experience before her engagement with Eclair was but little. But everyone who has witnessed her most remarkable work in "Filial Love" (released September 19th) is of the one verdict: she is a success, a find. Almost alone does she carry the burden of a two-reel story with a sincerity and convincingness which many of her very much older fellow artists would be proud to have accomplished.

SWANSON PLANS A CHAIN OF THEATERS.

Mr. William H. Swanson of the Universal Film Company of New York and elsewhere, recently purchased Max Daniels' share of the Rex theater at Salt Lake City, Utah. It is understood that the consideration went into the figures of $70,000. The Rex Theater is recognized as one of the finest theaters in the West, and was erected and furnished at a cost of $180,000. Mr. Daniels held the position of secretary and treasurer of the company. Mr. Swanson expects to invade California, Washington, Idaho and Oregon, and he already operates houses in Denver and Pueblo. Moving picture and vaudeville will constitute the performances at Mr. Swanson's theaters.

The Moving Picture Educator

VARIOUS ADDITIONAL STUDIES TAUGHT BY CINEMATOGRAPHY.

WHILE it has been shown that all the usual kindergarten, grammar and high school subjects are taught by the cinematograph, it must not be supposed by any means that there is any limitation to its curriculum. One of the first and best aids to general scholastic courses is that of physical culture. Here the photo-teacher is especially helpful. The benefit of muscle development, the true art of breathing, correct sitting and walking, and the care of the teeth, are all parts of this course. In the Y. M. C. A., and also the Y. W. C. A., which adapt themselves to these particular courses, the photo-teacher is destined to take an important part.

One of the older films already noticed, was an instructive course on water, showing pure and impure conditions, with their good and evil results. Another recent film is on the air. This is specially produced for the purpose of showing the evils of dust and other substances which float in space, illustrating the spread of disease, the need for and the effects of antiseptics and disinfectants, and the good health results of cleanliness as against the foul produce of filth. The film on flies was one of the most useful ever produced. There are now forthcoming others, showing many insects as they exist, both for good and evil. In this connection there are many places which will auspiciously await the solution of that long unsolved problem, "the mission of the mosquito." It is one of the revelations of micro-cinematography that the insect world has inhabitants in their minute proportions more powerful than the largest animals. Consequently their size and number make them more deadly, so that it is possible for an unclean house to shelter more deadly or dangerous inhabitants than are the denizens of the jungle. The agency which reveals and explains these is a great benefactor, as well as teacher. Truly the coming generations are going to be well equipped with the best knowledge.

After a period of seeming depression, or waiting, manufacturers' advance notes show a revival of interesting pictures which become educational. There is a great increase in "feature" film making; the greater majority of these, while primarily not so intended, become of educational value. The fact that more and higher education is being called into use in the studio suggests that those same qualities will appear upon the screen and so must impress the public.

As a result of the above condition it is most noticeable everywhere that the tone of the picture house is improving. Education and culture are twins which nothing can separate, and while we cannot have every picture upon an educational basis, those showing culture help the same cause.

RECENT PICTURES OF ANCIENT EGYPTIAN TEMPLES.

ANOTHER of the Kalem series of Egyptian pictures is approaching release. Consistent with others of this valuable series this one showing ruins of ancient temples is full of interests. The Temple of Luxor is probably one of the best known of these ruins, which, with its "Avenue of Columns" shows great architectural beauty and immensity of construction. These unusual pictures bring to us an "unwritten history," for in them can be read the history, not only of the times, but also the art and science of great buildings and stupendous undertakings, when only "brain and brawn" were at the command of the builders. For extraordinary size the great Temple of Karwak is one of the wonders of the departed glory of Egypt. In the foreground of the great Hall stands a column 23 feet in circumference. This size being especially called to the attention of the beholder by the number of Kalem people who join hands and encircle it. The wonder of the great buildings being in ruins, when they have the appearance of having been built to withstand long ages finds its answer in the fact that an act of peculiar vandalism is responsible therefore. It appears that later rulers, who possessed neither the wisdom of ambition of their progenitors, used the great and already sculptured stones of these magnificent buildings to enrich their own private palaces; the continuance of this selfish practice is the cause of these ruins, which bespeak for themselves their former grandeur. A secret passage-way supposed to be a private passage-way for the ancient Kings in the Temple of Karmak is made especially noticeable by the emerging members of the Kalem party.

The Temple of Thebes is much on the same order as the others, its especial interest being found in the colossi which are 54 feet high, and by the "valley of death."

Two modern pictures are introduced with interest, one showing the Kalem party embarking in very primitive fashion for a journey on the Nile; and another giving a lengthy view of a Mohammedan procession with emblematic evidences of its religious character. Fakirs selling "Antiques" (of very modern make), is a true part of the experience of Egyptian travellers to-day, the Kalem party are no exception to the rules, the pictures however do not show to what extent they were victims.

It is a pleasure to add this to the list of scenic, historic, and educational pictures, enlarging the series of what will prove to be one of the most valuable to young Egyptologists in America. Not alone as scholastic, but as biblical illustrations, will their value be enhanced, and their good will be of the enduring nature, going far beyond a temporary occasion but in preserving that which is worthy for all time.

NOTES.

The public schools are open again, and Young America is in the pursuit of knowledge. What does this mean to the moving picture? Each school year sees some distinct advance in applied cinematography; the coming season will see more such advances than all its predecessors. Many schools are already equipped, others are experimenting. The number of suitable films has perhaps doubled, so that it will be a pleasure for this page to wake the progress and record the results which are sure to be important.

If the city of Washington, as the Capitol of the United States is not known with remarkable familiarity in every nook and corner of the world, it will not be the fault of the Cinematograph. Added to the already long list of films of this famous city, the edison Company announced for August 10 another series which, while presenting perhaps little not already portrayed, claims pre-eminence in "photographic splendor." It can only increase the educational value of such views to have them increase in detail perfection, and while tending to increase loyalty at home, must also command admiration abroad.

The intelligence and sagcity of animals is again shown in the admirable Paris Eclair "The Detective's Dog." Our French friends seem at regular intervals to present subjects in which various animals take the most important parts. These pictures are among those most welcomed by young people, who fairly idolize any trained animal. On the same reel "Among the Bedouins" is a most unusual picture, being far out of "the beaten track." It shows perhaps for the first time a race of people famous for their nomadic characteristics, occasionally mild and approachable, and again at times ferociously banded to rob and kill. The film depicts the former class as evidenced by their domestic pursuits and child-school life; it is a valuable addition to the films of "races of people" coming from Eclair.

NOTED AUTHORS WRITE FOR SELIG.

Among the internationally famous authors who are now writing scenarios for the Selig Polyscope Company are Randall Parish, Molly Elliott Sewell, Albert Biglow Paine, Bertrand W. Sinclair, B. M. Bower, Roy Norton, B. M. Ferguson, Capt. Charles King and Marjorie Benton Cook.

C. E. NIXON NOW A SELIG EDITOR.

Mr. Charles E. Nixon, who wrote the scenario of "The Coming of Columbus," "Daughter of the Confederacy," etc., and adapted Randall Parish's story, "When Wilderness Was King," for the Selig Polyscope Company, is now a regular member of the Selig scenario department and will write exclusively for the Selig Company in the future.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

IN commenting upon the recent national convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League in Chicago, one of the motion picture publications takes the position that its efforts in behalf of the exhibitors for several years past really brought about the success of the convention, and evolved the bright future that appears to be in store for the business. Of course, nobody, other than the editor making it, will look upon the claim seriously, and it is not intended here to try and convince him that he is not all he claims to be. In his comments he says that a few years ago the exhibitor was under the heel of the tyrant exchanges and manufacturers. Now that they have been shown their rights and privileges, they have become masters of the situation.

Careful reading of the addresses and reports of the convention have failed to reconcile with them the sentiments of the editor in question. It cannot be recalled that any of the delegates spoke with any vindictiveness towards exchanges or manufacturers. Their attention was directed to the efforts required to increase the interest of the public in their exhibitions and impress upon the people the service rendered them from an intellectual standpoint. The color given the proceedings by those in charge of and actively interested in the convention was, as one delegate put it, "to banish petty strifes and jealousies," which is directly antagonistic to the sentiments that form the basis of the editor's claims. National President Neff struck the right keynote in his reference to manufacturers, exchanges and others when he said, "We want to meet you. We want to become better acquainted with you. We want to advise with you and receive suggestions from you."

It is hoped every exhibitor, exchange manager and film manufacturer will give serious thought to Mr. Neff's remarks. If they do many very unpleasant conditions that now exist will be speedily wiped out and, as between the three branches of the business, there will be less occasion for criticism upon the methods of each other. Every effort should be directed by the trio to the abolishment of all friction, so that their united strength may be directed against the ever-present tormentor on the outside—the fanatical and subsidized reformer.

The views of one of the best known men in the motion picture field, as expressed during a visit to this city a few days ago, will fit in well here. "In no manner can any branch of the business of to-day be brought in touch by comparison with the conditions as they existed a few years ago. In the early years everything had a natural tendency to create jealousy and antagonism. Many people who were exhibitors or conducted rental exchanges, commenced to branch out as manufacturers. Many who did not have the opportunity to do likewise were inclined to resent what they looked upon as domineering tactics on the part of those who but a short time previously had, like themselves, been exhibitors or renters. Exhibitors at that time were of a minor grade of importance. The manufacturers were not turning out films as frequently and in such quantities as they are to-day, nor were there so many of them, and it was not necessary to have so many outlets for the subjects to keep up with the sources of supply."

"The changes that have taken place since that time have been most extraordinary. No other business has shown the same amount of development within the same period. How, then, must the conditions between the parties directly interested have changed? Manufacturers, exchanges and exhibitors have made gigantic advances and their responsibilities to each other have been correspondingly created and increased. It is just as foolish for the exhibitor of to-day to say 'the manufacturers do not care a snap for us. They are making plenty of money and we must take what they give us,' as it is for the manufacturers to try and believe that they need not care for the exhibitors, because they must have the films to meet the demands of the public. The film exchange men should know their duty without suggestion from any source. The managers well know that to be up to date they should keep supplied with the best the market affords and to place the supply they must co-operate with the exhibitor."

"So it happens that the day for conference has arrived. The exhibitors and the sources of film supply have attained positions of distinction that demand mutual recognition, so that the industry as a whole may be cleared of defects and oversights which tend to delay that satisfaction and confidence which all concerned seem desirous to promote. To achieve this the manufacturers, renters and exhibitors must be brought together occasionally that they may discuss conditions, correct misapprehensions and correct evils. Most differences arise between renters and exhibitors. The latter know they have no direct relations with the manufacturers, but they feel that occasional conferences with the latter might induce them to use their influence in correcting evils in the exchanges."

Effort was made to induce the speaker to specify some of the evils in exchanges which he had intimated could not be adjusted with the exchanges direct. This he declined to do, stating that the complaints were many and must be well known in all quarters, as they are publicly discussed every day. It was not his intention, he said, to rush into print with them. "Most, if not all, the manufacturers feel that they perform their full duty when they do their best in the manufacturing line and that troubles arising between exhibitors and exchanges are beyond the jurisdiction of manufacturers." In a general sense this may be true, but there are exceptions. If the manager of an exchange is incompetent, the manufacturer has as much interest as a manufacturer in any other line who finds his business suffers through an incompetent jobber. An occasional arbitration would make things run more smoothly, and nothing but a conference or arbitration will do it. If you go to the manufacturer direct he very firmly but politely, refers you to the renter, and he calls you a kicker and a tightwad. Now while there's a way, why not have the will? Occasional direct recognition of the exhibitors by the manufacturers would work wonders in cementing cordial relations between them. There are chronic kickers and unreasonable men among the exhibitors, but many of them would not be such if the real situations were intelligently explained to them. To the intelligent class of exhibitors, men who have large investments in the business, the treatment they receive at some of the exchanges is offensive to the extent that they seek service elsewhere, regardless of quality and rather than submit to indignities. What the exhibitors want is redress for just complaints, and most renters do not seem sufficiently interested to accord this. Some of the managers are excellent fellows personally. Unfortunately, if not incompetent, some of them suffer from enlargement of the cranium. Their responsibilities are no greater than those of the exhibitor to the public and when their shortcomings hamper the manager there should be some means of helping the manager out with the people who patronize him, so that he may retain their interest and confidence, and thus help to aid the business generally. I sincerely trust the manufacturers will take up this arbitration or conference suggestion. It will not take more than one session to show them that by so doing they will vitally advance their own financial interest by holding trade that slips away through indifference and carelessness on the part of those who are expected to hold it.

ECLAIR FOLK WILL DANCE.

The Eclair Employees' Association announce a ball to be given on Friday, September 27th at Cella's Hall, Fort Lee. Mr. H. Maire, technical director of the Eclair plant, is president of the association and he promises a great big wholehearted good time to all who will journey over to attend. Tickets, 50 cents each.

Mr. Maire insists that there is not a better place on this side of the world for "eats" than is Cella's cuisine. He argues the beauty of the village as an attraction, Eclair's beauty chorus and an abundance of lover's lanes. All of which is quite some luring argument. He says Miss Tennant has promised to make no attempt to make her eyes behave, which vision alone is worth the journey abroad to Jersey shores. Isabel and Muriel and Isabel's mother, too, have signed a bond to appear. Miss Stewart consents to chaperone if formality is to be desired. Little Clara Horton has secured her mother's consent to stay up till eleven. Geo. Larkin will start a buck and wing contest. Johnstone promises a dance to every girl, if they all desire. Francis threatens to prove he's not as old as he acts and Frazer will put his bells on. Sterling will give every one a part for the next day. Grisel may be induced to come with Bill Haddock. And last, but not least, if abduction plans do not miscarry, they will have E. Arnaud in the midst of the "welcome to our village" Eclairites. So on and so forth. Come—be friendly.

BY CLARENCE E. SINN

CHAS. S. OFFENBERG, pianist at Coliseum Theater, Toledo, Ohio., writes: "Dear Sir.—I take pleasure in sending a musical program for the 3-reel Thanhouser feature film "Lucile" as presented at the Coliseum Theater, Toledo to a most appreciative audience of over 8,500. Hope that same will be instrumental in encouraging and aiding pianists to give this 'silent drama' an appropriate musical accompaniment. Your very truly."

"LUCILE" (Thanhouser).

First Reel.

1. "The Last Rose of Summer" until title "In a Spirit of Pique He Makes Love to Matilda."
2. "Charme d'Amour" (by Kendall) until "Lucile Desires But One Last Look, etc."
3. "It Was Not So To Be" (from "The Trumpeter of Sakkington") Eclipse Pub. Co. till "Lord Alfred, I Present Duke, etc."
4. Neutral Waltz or improvisation until "The Rain Fell in Large Drops."
5. Agitato and heavy bass imitating rumbling of thunder till "Lucile, Be My Wife."
6. Grandioso appassionato (Aria from "Samson and Delilah" by Saint Saens, or "My Heart At Thy Sweet Voice" by Schirmer—piano arrangements—being very suitable).

Second Reel.

1. Quartette from "Rigoletto" until "Lord Alfred Believes Lucille False."
2. "Then You'll Remember Me" (Bohemian Girl) until "Lord Alfred Is Wed to Matilda."
3. Bridal Chorus from "Lohengrin" until "In Solitude the Duke Hopes to Forget."
4. "The Rosary" (by Nevin) until "After Many Years the Duke Adopts, etc."
5. "Fleurette" (by Victor Herbert) and "Yester Thoughts" (also Herbert) until "The Young Englishman Met Her."
6. "I Am Falling In Love With Someone" (from "Naughty Marietta") or "Enchantment" by Rolfe (Witmark) until "No, Constance Wed Your Son?"
7. "Loves Longing" (by Frontini, published by Schirmer) until "The Sun Has no Nation, etc."
8. "Twilight"—melody by Frieml (Schirmer).

Third Reel.

1. "Light Cavalry Overture" (by Suppe) until "Then Fighting Richard Fell.'
2. Melody by Massenet Opus 10. (Schirmer, pub.), then "Cavatina" by Raff and "Love's Greeting" by Elgar (Century Edition) until "The Ways are Many, etc."
3. "Consolation" (Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words") till finish of reel.

Sorry I did not get Brother Offenberg's letter in time for last week's paper. The constituency certainly owes him a vote of thanks for the splendid musical setting he offers for Thanhouser's beautiful picture. Call again Chas. S.—always welcome.

TIPS ON IMPROVISING.

A frequently heard complaint levelled at pianists, particularly they who improvise or play from memory is a proneness to stick to one key throughout the picture; sometimes throughout the entire show. Occasionally this is due to carelessness on the part of the performer. More often it occurs through lack of familiarity with the laws governing "modulation and progression." ("Modulation" means going from one key to another; "progression" signifies going from one chord to another.)

Following a picture closely with its constantly shifting scenes implies a frequent change of tempo and movement in the music. To the improvisor this becomes second nature and is done almost automatically, but too often he is content with this change alone and seldom or never departs from his original key, thus making his work monotonous. A few pleasing chords modulating to another key should be introduced once in a while—not necessarily at every change of tempo, but often enough to give a variety to your music.

The player who depends on his notes or memory simply "goes to the next number" when the change of scene requires, and as this usually occurs in the midst of a phrase the transition is frequently too abrupt to be pleasing. A connecting phrase leading from one movement to another should be introduced, blending the two together.

A series of articles on this subject is here begun which it is hoped will be of interest to many of our readers. These will embrace hints on modulation, etc., but are not to be construed as lessons in harmony though some technical terms must be used. These will be explained as they occur.

The tonic of any key is the "key note" of that key; (the note on which its scale is founded). Thus, the tonic of the key of C is the note "C." The tonic of the key of A is the note "A." This holds good in all keys. A tonic chord of any key is the chord which is built upon the tonic of that key. Thus, the tonic chord of the key of C is built upon the note "C" and consists of the notes "C, E, and G." No matter how they are placed in relation to each other this is always the tonic chord of C so long as it contains these three notes only. Of course their octaves may be added—any note in the chord may be doubled indefinitely without altering the nature of the chord.

The dominant lies a fifth above and the sub-dominant a fifth below the tonic. Thus, in the key of C the tonic is "C" and the dominant is "G"—a fifth above C. (count up "C, D, E, F, G"). The sub-dominant is "F"—a fifth below. (count down "C, B, A, G, F"). (The above must be committed to memory and practiced in all keys so that the tonic, dominant and sub-dominant chords of all keys are thoroughly familiar to you.)

The dominant chord is the chord built on the dominant of the key. "G" being the dominant of C, the dominant chord of C would therefore consist of the notes "G, B, and D"; thus:

GBD (or) DGB (or) BDG

(The different positions as given above are called "inversions" and do not alter the name of the chord.)

The chord of the sub-dominant is built on the sub-dominant of the key. The sub-dominant of C being "F" the sub-dominant chord of C is therefore written:

FAC (or) CFA (or) ACF

The simplest modulations are those to what are called "relative keys." First is the relative minor whose "key-note" lies a 3d below the tonic. "A minor" is relative to the key of C. A is a 3d below C. (count down "C, B, A.")—B minor is relative to the key of D; D minor to F, etc.

The relative major keys are two in number; their "key-notes" are respectively a 5th below and a 5th above the tonic. The relative major keys of C are therefore the key of "G" (signature one sharp) and the key of "F" (signature one flat).

Key of F—Relative minor, D minor; relative majors, B flat and C.

Key of B flat—Relative minor, G minor; relative majors, E flat and F.

Key of E flat—Relative minor, C minor; relative majors, A flat and B flat.

Key of A flat—Relative minor, F minor; relative majors, D flat and E flat.

Key of D flat—Relative minor, B flat minor; relative majors, G flat and A flat.

Key of G flat—Relative minor, E flat minor; relative majors, C flat and D flat.

Key of C flat—Relative minor, A flat minor; relative majors, F flat and G flat.

Key of G—Relative minor, E minor; relative majors, C and D.

Key of D—Relative minor, E minor; relative majors, G and A.

Key of A—Relative minor, F sharp minor; relative majors, D and E.

Key of E—Relative minor, C sharp minor; relative majors, A and B.

Key of B—Relative minor, G sharp minor; relative majors, E and F sharp.

Key of F sharp—Relative minor, D sharp minor; relative majors, B and C sharp.

Key of C sharp—Relative minor, A sharp minor; relative majors, F sharp and G sharp.

Modulations may be made from any key to its relative keys without any connecting chords; i. e., the ear does not need to be prepared for the change of key in such modulations.

(To be continued.)

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

More from Japan.

WE are glad to enroll the Arcade Theater, Tientsin, among the regular contributors to this department. In the latest batch of stuff it is apparent that with them the special is the thing, and they have been playing Zigomar, and apparently found the Eclair film a profitable one for three pieces of advertising cover the advertising work. Of these the most pretentious is a four-page folder on heavy paper printed in red and black. This carries the story of the film and a four-page insert of rather poorly printed cuts. Cuts are valuable, but these, though printed on good paper, were apparently run off too rapidly without make-ready. It does not harmonize with the salmon-colored cover, and we incline to the belief that the cover alone would have been better. The back page is given over to the Kiel regatta, and here the cut is almost entirely lost in smudge, though a small handbill in blue on white, printed in German, and apparently in Germany, shows better results.

Two hand-bills back up the heavier advertisement for Zigomar, which was run for two nights. Here the cuts come out better, one on a native paper taking the color very nicely. This advertises the film "Only To-night," and "No more after to-night," which is certainly definite. One line advises the reader that "If you miss it to-night, you miss it forever," which is a good line for American use. Another good argument is this:

> It is difficult to convey any adequate idea of this stupendous achievement. The contest between these two men, each so full of daring and resource, each so determined to conquer, provides us with a matchless film. So rapid, realistic and thrilling are the episodes that the spectator is caught and whirled away into a region of breathless excitement and enthralling interest. The grip of the story never relaxes for a moment until the close, when one is left with a delightful sensation of having seen something quite unique.

We will very greatly appreciate a letter from the managers of the Arcade on advertising in China. They seem to be very much alive to the possibilities of promotion, and we are sure that such a letter will interest American managers.

To mark an anniversary the Lyric Theater, Earlville, Ill., issued a souvenir program September 2. It was a heavy cream card folder with an etching in brown for the cover without any printing, not a crude rush job, but a good piece of work purchased ready printed from Hennegan. Inside the printing announces the program and the occasion and makes this plea:

> THE THEATER
> Will be conducted in an orderly manner. Every attention paid to the comfort and safety of our guests. Come and get the habit.
> ---
> The management invites you to be a constant patron, assuring you that you will always see the best pictures presented under the best conditions possible.

The repetition of "best" in the last paragraph should have been avoided through the substitution of a synonym to give smoothness in reading. "Best pictures under perfect projection conditions" would have meant the same thing, while reading more smoothly, and there is the hint of "shop" in the use of "projection" that will appeal to many persons and be understood by all. We do not wholly like that "orderly manner" either. "This theater will be conducted as a first-class home of amusement" would have been better. We think we should have written something more along these lines:

> The Lyric Theater is the home of clean, wholesome entertainment. In its appointment and management it equals the best and the management uses its utmost endeavor at all times to contribute most fully to the satisfaction and comfort of its patrons. Not only is the house comfortable and well appointed, but at all times we offer the best pictures procurable, presented under the most perfect projection conditions of clear screen and an up-to-date projection machine run by a first-class union operator. Come once and you'll be a regular.

Uses Postals.

Markowitz and Brandt, of the Clinton Court Theater, New York, have been using special post cards for Reliance's "Secret Service Man," showing a cut of the poster, the synopsis, the date, and a reference to their mirror screen. This house is in the populous east side district, where addresses frequently change, and many theater-goers cannot read English, so we fancy that the distribution was more directly made than by mail. We will appreciate it if those who kindly send samples will add a line as to the method of distribution employed. The card is well gotten up, and if distributed a few days in advance should have made for business, for the catchy poster cut shows a motor cycle racing a railroad train, and making almost as much smoke as the locomotive.

Another Answer.

We wondered why Dean R. Daynes, of the Mission Theater, Salt Lake City, did not stand up and answer present when his name was on the roll call lately. Here's the answer:

> Though a very thorough reader of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, especially the department devoted to "Advertising for Exhibitors," some way or other your call in the issue June the 22d, for "old friends," "old regulars," "assistant editors," and other flattering appellations, entirely escaped my notice until to-day.
> Oh yes, I refer to old copies very often, and if something gets by me the first time I am sure to nail it later on. I have used suggestions from issues of the World two years old and would undoubtedly delve farther back than that if older copies were nearer at hand.
> I am very much aware that the "Advertising for Exhibitors" department did not shut down for the summer, but the Mission did, and upon its reopening I hope to have many contributions for several departments in the World.
>
> Just a word about some of the improvements, now under way, that may interest you, for, I believe, any act which would tend to make people revisit the theater should be included in the "Advertising for Exhibitors" columns.
> You can make patrons advertise your place by giving them a good show, some courteous treatment, and a comfortably arranged house. Of the latter I wish to say, I am losing over one hundred seats in rearranging to allow greater distance between rows and an additional aisle in the center. There will be a tier of four seats against each side wall, and two tiers of six seats down the center, this gives three aisles, and there will be thirty-two inches between rows. If the ushers use ordinary good judgment in seating patrons, very few, if any, should be obliged to stand to let others in or out of the row. I think in picture theaters, where the exhibition is continuous, and the audience is changed often, short rows are more essential and afford more comfort to spectators than many exhibitors realize. At least in this city most of the theaters have twelve seats in the center tier, which causes a lot of jumping up and down, and in some places the audience is packed in twenty-six or twenty-eight-inch rows, like sardines.
> Among other features that will be advertised by patrons will be five Licensed pictures, first run, changed twice weekly with a special release, whenever available, with no advance in admission price. A ten-piece orchestra and pipe organ. A sanitary electric fountain will grace the foyer opposite the entrance, and will form a decorative blind to prevent light from the street striking the picture screen. Everything in and out of the theater will be new but the opera chairs, the spot light, and the money changer; even the name. It will be the Broadway after the recently renamed street which it helps to adorn.
> Shortly after opening, about October 1, I will have something awfully good for you; that is, I think so.
> I might also add other good features of the new house will be: Indirect lighting system, indirect heating system, a good ventilating system, concrete projection booth, concrete rewinding booth and concrete booth for rheostats and rectifier, vacuum cleaning system, large ladies' room and check room, a small projection room in the basement to run over reels.

One Novel Feature.

By a "small projection room in the basement," we understand Mr. Daynes to mean a private theater where the reels may be examined as they are in the cutting rooms of the studios. This is handy where the reels are run for the orchestra leader, the manager and the operator, and where the cost of an extra projection machine is not an objection. It gets the manager, the operator and the musicians in closer touch than where the reels are tried out in the main auditorium.

Competition is lively in the Mormon capital and we think that some of the houses are well worth looking over.

We are entirely in agreement with Mr. Daynes in that we think that anything that brings business to the house should be regarded as advertising. We know of one case here in New York where the affable lobby man, who has precisely the right attitude of welcome, brought more real business than a dozen big ads at fifty cents a line. It was a vaudeville, not a photoplay house, but the idea is the same.

And just make a mental note that Mr. Daynes is answering an inquiry made back in June. Advertising is not for the moment. It lasts long after the initial publication. A couple of years ago the Lubin Company used a ten-line advertisement one time in a widely circulated periodical, and answers kept drifting in for a year after the date of issue. Plan your advertising so that it will stick and you'll get double and triple value. Sometimes the advertisement that brings the smallest direct returns will be the most profitable in the long run. It is for this reason that the manager should plan to use some general matter even when billing some special feature. Do not merely advertise the reel. Advertise the house as well with some catchlines.

Push with a Punch.

F. H. Franke, of the California Theater, Chicago, sends some of the advertising he recently sent out for the Bell Theater, which he recently took over. The set consists of a letter and a blotter contained in an envelope somewhat in the style of a night message, and is boldly titled "Night Postgram," and addressed:

To Mr. and Mrs. Stranger,
Chicago, Ill.
But never mind the stranger,
Let's get acquainted.

This and the number and charge mark are done in imitation typewriting, in black, while the rest of the envelope is in red. Inside there is offered a sound argument for the pictures. Here are a couple of the paragraphs:

> Possibly you have never seen the modern motion picture show, believing, because of the low price of admission it could not be good, but do you know that fully three-fourths of the former vaudeville houses throughout the country have now been given over to this more pleasant form of amusement?
> Again, most of the better class photoplay houses are now conducted with the same care and attention that any first-class theater should have—and ours is one of them.

We have changed the wording slightly, but not much. As a postscript identification is added: "Also operating the California Theater, 26th Street and Trumbull Avenue, seating capacity 800. The Clark Theater, seating capacity 1,200, Clark Street and Wilson Avenue.

Blotting Talk.

The blotter makes the only allusion to the new management in the catch-line:

A NEW BROOM SWEEPS WELL.

> Yes, we've done a lot of sweeping, cleaning up, and decorating, made the house new from top to bottom. Installed up-to-date machinery, more fans and a new patented curtain. This curtain eliminates absolutely
> ALL EYE STRAIN

There is nothing boastful about this, but it argues for a spick and span house. The second panel, the space being divided into thirds, offers these:

SHOW NEWER, BETTER AND MORE PICTURES, > and show them in the best possible manner. An entire new staff of attendants, Lady Ushers and Cashier insure you the most courteous treatment.

EVER HEAR OF DAYLIGHT PICTURES?

> Daylight pictures means showing pictures in a well-lighted house.

WE SHOW THEM.

The third appeals to the children and announces the desire of the management to see them all at the Saturday matinee, ending with: "If you haven't got a nickel, COME ANYWAY. We will see to it that you get the money.

Outside of a certain tendency to use periods where commas should have been placed, the argument reads well. A circular advertising company made house to house distribution, employing men to place the envelopes in the first and second floors of all buildings in the territory. Now that Mr. Franke has found his way in we hope he comes again.

Has His Own Troubles.

Most managers find trouble in getting the printer to follow copy, so all will appreciate the position of A. M. Gruber, of the Hippodrome, Keystone, W. Va., who has to have his work done in the sole job office in the town which is run by negroes who will not follow copy. Mr. Gruber writes that he opened June 15th and has been doing the business of the town. In October he will start an advertising program, but meantime he uses handbills on cheap colored stock. One of these is an acrostic more or less in rhyme, that is a good variant to the usual advertisement. The other sample sent reads as though it might mean business. This is the way it runs:

WHY

> is Hippodrome synonymous with S.R.O.? Answer. The best draws standing room only and so does the Hippodrome!
> Cast your optics on this for tonight: The Little Shut In. You remember the "Child Bride." This is by the same Thanhouser child.
> A Bridegroom's Trouble. Johnny Wise gets married and loses his bride. Does he find her? Yes, but how.
> The Immigrant's Violin. A young Italian girl arrives in America and gets lost, but is traced by her wonderful playing on the violin.
> A man said to me yesterday: "Grube, why is it that you always have such good special features? The answer: "Because we know how."
> THURSDAY: "Under Two Flags." FRIDAY: A Bison 101 Feature, "The Post Telegrapher."
> Prices tonight: 5 and 10 cents; Thursday and Friday, 10 and 15 cents.

Hennegan Helps.

The latest Hennegan sheet offers the manager the usual assortment of novelties in colored printing. We particularly like some strip day daters in two printings which give three colors. These merely carry the day and are to be pasted on posters. These strips are so small priced that it seems absurd to buy a three sheet and then spoil the effect with a home painted "Wednesday" when the strips may be had in paper for one cent each or on card for two cents. Nothing pulls down a lobby display quicker than decorating the printed paper with additions in white paper and brush work.

The Hennegan company offers a lot of useful stock material, not merely posters but strips for program boards, various sorts of dates, cards and sheets with one large letter each for making up signs and banners and for an investment of a couple of dollars a week the lobby can be kept entirely free from home made stuff. It may seem a waste to use a printed strip when you can do it with a marking brush for nothing, but if you want a clean looking lobby you'll throw the brush away once you try the strips.

The anniversary program of the Lyric, Earlville, spoken of above is also a Hennegan offering and there is the usual addition to the long list of heralds.

Right in Line.

Just about now is a good time to keep away from political questions, because unless the whole town thinks as you do your opinions are best kept to yourself, but non-partisan matter will attract attention if played up, and the Alhambra Theater, Seattle, makes use of the excitement to form a fourth party. Here is a sample ad that is self explanatory:

FOURTH BIG PARTY STARTED

> Democrats, Republicans and Bull Moose are joining the new party in great numbers!
> It is known as the ALHAMBRA PARTY.
> It is made up of people who have found out that the ALHAMBRA Theater is giving the best entertainment in this town, the biggest 5 and 10-cent show in the world.
> It costs 10 cents to join. Its platform is: Shall the people enjoy themselves? Yes.
> If you drop around tonight, Friday, Saturday or Sunday you will be sure to take out a life membership in the ALHAMBRA PARTY, for then the ALHAMBRA will have the finest program it has ever put on. Note the features.

There follows a reasonably full description of the films for the half week, and then it winds up with:

> Membership blanks for the ALHAMBRA PARTY at the box office.
> The ALHAMBRA PARTY never had a bolter.

Plenty of Space.

Advertising of this sort cannot be done in small space and unless you can buy a quarter page display it would be better to work the idea over for a hand bill. This space was well handled, but a second day advertisement purporting to give the opinions of the three candidates was not so well done and let the interest sag. Facetious comment seems to be the long suit of the Alhambra, for another adcertisement announces that

> In order to accommodate our millions of patrons, the far-seeing and progressive traction company has arranged to operate all of its Capitol Hill, Broadway, Fremont-Ballard, West Woodland, Green Lake, Wallingford, Meridian and Phinney cars directly by our corner, Westlake and Pine.
>
> Rival managers are cordially invited to drop in and admit that we have a better show than they have.
> ---
> 10c for the best seats.
> 5c for the next best.
> 80o of each.

Of these three paragraphs the last is the best because it is pithy and means something, and we like "next best" far better than "second best." It means the same thing but there is less sting to the five cent patrons. We think that the Alhambra would do better to stick to one glad paragraph a day and let the rest be given to the house and its attractions. Humor tires in excess and it would be better to hold to argument and use the joke merely as the gilding on the pill.

References to rival managements should be excluded from advertising. For the purpose of publicity it should not be admitted that there are such things as other managements.

May Be Some Action.

The Kraus Manufacturing Company announces willingness to respond to the call of the managers if it becomes apparent that there is a real demand for photographs of scenes from photoplays. M. A. Kraus, speaking of the recent inquiries from Mr. Midgley and others expresses his belief that he can get out a service in reproduction instead of photograph, giving one scene from each of the licensed releases for a moderate sum, provided that the manufacturers will collaborate with him to the extent of supplying him with the still pictures.

Most manufacturers have some arrangement with a lithograph company to pay the loss, if any, on their posters and we think that they will be glad to supply these still pictures without charge. The Kraus scheme is to make weekly distribution of sets of reproductions, one for each reel (not each subject) and arrange with some frame maker to supply brass frames to fit the pictures.

His process is one giving a glazed finish reproduction, and those who have seen the Odyssey or Bernhardt-Camille postcards or the cards of photoplayers recently handled by the Exhibitors Advertising and Specialty Company and the Photoplay Advertising and Specialty Company will know the work. If you are interested let us have your opinion and we will pass it along to Mr. Kraus. There seems to be a demand for the photographs, but the company wants to be reasonably certain of selling not fewer than five hundred sets weekly. Our understanding is that the pictures will be about 8 x 10 inches and the cost of the service, which is based on the coming seven subjects a day, will be about two dollars.

In passing it might be mentioned that a second set of twelve photoplayer cards is on the press, supplementing the first list.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Danger Ahead.

WITH the increase in the number of amateur photoplaywrights there has come an alarming increase in the number of stolen plots that are being offered. Within the past month we have seen four letters from alleged authors, who calmly admit that they derived inspiration from some old magazine story. We are sorry to say that no action was taken on these confessions though two of the stories had been purchased before the discovery was made that they were not original. Unless something can be done to check this wholesale thievery, we think that the time will not be long before the editors will come to deal only with those whom they know to be trustworthy. Perhaps by that time there will be some association of photoplaywrights who can take such matters up and prosecute the thefts on behalf of the business at large since the manufacturers do not seem disposed to act on the question. Most studios require that a release slip be signed stating that the story is of the author's own devising, and a few prosecutions of flagrant offenses would do much to clear the situation. With no further evidence than the signed release slip and a copy of the original story, we believe conviction and imprisonment for obtaining money under false pretenses would immediately follow. It is a pity that, for the sake of the little army of real authors, some such drastic action is not had, for if the matter grows to much greater proportions many promising writers will be barred from consideration on general principles. Oddly enough some of the offenders are without guilty intent. They simply know no better.

Bison Scripts.

We answered briefly last week the prevalent Bison question, but here is the situation in full. When the Bison brand was merged with the other constituents of the newly formed Universal Company, all scripts held in the Western studios were turned over to Richard V. Spencer, by direction of the Universal. Very shortly the New York Motion Picture Company, which owned the Bison brand, withdrew from the Universal and as nearly as possible the scripts received by Mr. Spencer from the other brands of the Universal were held to await court order. When the Bison office was taken possession of by the Universal office these scripts were turned over to the Universal representative by Mr. Spencer. Subsequently the Bison returned such of the scripts in its possession as it did not want. It is quite possible that Universal got some Bison scripts, and vice versa, and those whose scripts have not been returned to date should recopy the carbons and send them out again, notifying both Bison and the Universal home office at 1 Union Square, New York City, that this course will be followed.

Mr. Spencer adds that four directors are at work on Broncho and Keystone films and that the old Allesandro Street address is still the proper place to which these scripts should be sent. Broncho makes western and some polite dramatic stories. Keystone stories are all comedies produced under the direction of Fred Mace and Mack Sennett, both formerly of the Biograph.

The exact disposition of the Bison brand will not be decided until the close of the pending litigation.

Do Not Bother Gaumont.

The Gaumont Company does not want any scripts. The statement is made now and then that the company is producing on this side of the ocean, but the statement is not correct, and no scripts are desired because none are being produced. It is not improbable that production may be started later, in which case due notice will be given in these columns. Meantime save stamps for yourself and trouble for the Gaumont Company.

One Point of View.

We've often wondered just how these correspondence school people felt about their work, and we've had some light on the subject lately in the form of correspondence with a man in a Pacific Coast town who offers a course of instruction for $2. To quote his own words, "These instructions were gotten from different companies, so we know we are not selling something you can give us the laugh on." Later in the correspondence he explains that he has the instruction sheets and personal advice from some ten companies which he has compiled into a system. In a later letter he advises us that he will not advertise in the future that he teaches photoplay, but that he merely teaches proper photoplay form.

The writer is more frank than some of the others. He was a hardware clerk with aspirations and more honesty than some others in the same line. Making a compilation of information that many companies offer free and helped, perhaps, by other courses and books, he has thrown together some information, more or less correct, and offers this to his patrons for $2, which should yield him a handsome profit.

In opposition to our stand in the matter of schools, it has been argued that these courses are based on instruction sheets and other printed matter. That is very true, but it takes more real cleverness to harmonize these various instruction sheets into an intelligent whole than to write a course based on personal knowledge, and the extent of this particular professor's personal knowledge may be judged from the fact that he offers to send us $2 to us for critical service and take his commission out in trade in the shape of criticism of his own scripts. Truly this is a case of the blind leading the blind, but here the sightless one has the grace to admit his infirmity.

No instruction is worth while that is not backed by personal knowledge of the subject, and it is for this reason that we object to schools, books, critical and revision service offered by those who do not intimately know the camera. It is not sufficient that companies have offered hints and suggestions. No instruction can possibly be good unless the instructor knows his business, and not even the selling of scripts can be accepted as the real test. Only the man who has stood beside the camera in and out of the studio, day after day, and week after week, is fully qualified to teach. Those who profess to do so without these qualifications deal unfairly with their clients.

We have handled a considerable number of school scripts in the past few weeks; scripts approved by the schools and passed on to editors, and the ignorance of some of these self-created experts is astounding. One school-sales bureau sends all its scripts out on onion skin paper, and they are never read, another permits all sorts of pointless stories to go the rounds. Another school recently passed with approval a script that any ten year old child might have known never would be accepted because of the salaciousness of the theme, and yet the school wrote the pupil that it was an unusually clever story.

We have no personal quarrel with the schools, but they are bad for the business in general in that they flood the studios with the work of the incompetent and poorly instructed, because they do not know the subject they profess to teach.

A Book on Plots.

While not treating of photoplay, we think that the photoplaywright will find in "The Plot of the Short Story" many helpful hints. This is the work of Henry Albert Phillips, a short story writer and critic of note. It is a little volume of 146 pages devoted solely to the plot, its formation and development, and Mr. Phillips proves himself a teacher as well as an author in this little work. He avoids the use of technical terms and shop expressions, treating his subject simply, sincerely and exhaustively. Photoplay is merely a plot in action instead of words, and most of Mr. Phillips' statements are as applicable to the photoplay as to the fiction story. Those who are building up their working library will find this a welcome addition. Here are a couple of excerpts that will give a taste of its flavor:

"The short story plot should set out to do one thing, and then complete it."

"Don't commence in earnest until you have examined your material from every point of view and have selected the finest for story effect. There is always one plot phase that is infinitely better than all the rest."

We are glad to note that Mr. Phillips emphasizes the statement we have so frequently made that there can be but one chief character in a story. A scandalously large percentage of failures in produced photoplay is due to a violation of the rule that there can be but one chief character, and not two or more. In "Technique of the Photoplay" we cover much of the material that appears in Mr. Phillips' book, but dealing with that single phase he is able to develop his ideas more exhaustively.

Has a Plant.

T. E. Letendre, editor of "The Photoplay Author," has purchased a printing plant which he will use for the magazine and a local weekly in which he is also interested. He thinks this will enable him to get out a better looking sheet and get it out on time.

Imagination.

A modest Californian offers some pertinent observations on plot getting and plot buying that are passed on to others who may profit by the advice. He writes:

> Will you permit me to say a few words in behalf of our mutual friend, Imagination? After reading letter after letter in your department from persons who write better photoplays than the studios produce, and yet do not sell them, I cannot but believe it is lack of imagination that is the ultimate bar to their success. The lack tells in two ways: Indirectly, it prevents their imaging to themselves their own bland egotism in supposing that a trained editor will choose an inferior scenario if he has a superior one to take its place; directly, it prevents their ever writing salable manuscripts.
> I should like each of these persons who has so written to remember that buying scenarios is no different at bottom from buying butter at the retail store. The disappointed writer would confidently expect a round scoring from his wife if he were to take home at his next shopping a rancid square of butter if fresh, wholesome squares were available. I am willing to attribute the same phase of human nature to the scenario editor. He'll turn down the stale, rancid plot for the fresh, wholesome one every chance he gets, and rightly so. I know, because I have tried to sell some that afterthought showed me were stale and rancid; and I have sold others that were fresh and wholesome.
> It only takes a definite, intentional exercise of the imagination to make a motion picture play that will sell. If a man lacks imagination he had better try to sell butter, not write scenarios. Imagination works best in that psychological state that is known as a brown study, a reverie. In the course of your business today happened something extraordinary, or maybe in your neighbor's business, or was it in your reading? After supper fill your pipe and sit in the quietest room in the house. Forget the names and the setting. Imagine new situations that would naturally result from the ones you have seen; imagine the characters moving through these new situations; imagine an ending for them or a complication. Close your eyes. Day-dream it.
> Have you read a story or seen one pictured that interested you? If it has five important characters there is the possibility of five stories in it by making each character in turn the main one. Imagine what would happen if another personage in the story were moved into the foreground and kept there. If you let that imagination work long enough and far enough, you'll get by the copyright law without difficulty—and you'll sell the scenario, if you have any ability at all to write it. Or keep the same sort of character (never, of course, really the SAME CHARACTER), in the lead, and change the setting in your imagination or imagine new complications on the same theme or the characters older or younger.

Somewhere in all this you'll run unexpectedly across YOUR story, the one YOU can handle. But it will never make its appearance until repeated flights have made the wings of your Imagination strong.

Two Questions.

Here are a couple of questions that offer interesting food for thought. The other day an editor wanted to know why it was that he could purchase more good scripts from St. Louis writers than from residents of the National Capital. Another man wanted to know why it was that most of the immoral scripts were sent in by women.

Washington boasts two photoplay stars in Capt. Charles Kiener and Emmett Campbell Hall, but we know of none others. In the same way Boston supplies fewer good writers of photoplays than does Philadelphia, and it is not because the Lubin Company has a studio in the latter town at that.

As to the other question we refuse discussion, but it is a well established fact in short fiction and photoplay that the blood-raw script usually is sent in by a woman.

We Rather Like It.

We rather like the tone of the last Photoplay Author. They merged two months into one to catch up, but they announced that each subscriber will have his credit advanced one month so that he will receive twelve issues, which is more decent treatment than most of these mergers permit.

In the current issue A. Van Buren Powell has a good story on how to cinch ideas for plots, and another plot getting hint is found in a picture of James Carroll lighting a pipe, presumably the one he smokes when he knocks out first prize contest stories. He tells how to do it in a few concise paragraphs. Here is the meat of the story:

> Get out of the beaten path. Evolve an original theme and clothe it right. Avoid the old, moss-grown plots, shun the murders, salaciousness, prison scenes, bar room scene, burglaries, etc., and give the eternal triangle a nice long rest.

That sounds easy, but see if you can do it.

There is an instruction sheet in one page, some editorial chat and notes. Mr. Letendre explains why he turned down a theatrical faker who wanted to advertise and announces that no school can use the time-worn line about what Emmett Campbell Hall made year before last as a bait for the unwary.

House organ sheets are warned not to reprint the copyrighted material, which probably will bring a shout from Boonville, Cleveland and other nurseries of photoplay art.

It's a good issue, very much better than the last—and more prompt.

Try for Stories.

If you've never written a short story did you ever think of trying?

A short story is more or less an amplified synopsis and, if you can write one you can write the other. Some of these days when you have a story that seems to take too much leader to get it over clearly, try it out as a short story instead of a photoplay. The very fact that it does require so much explanation would seem to indicate that it is a story and not a play. Photoplay writing is invaluable training for the fiction author, since an appreciation of situation is often the weakest point of the story writer's equipment, and it is possible to get a short story over with just one good situation. Map out the plot as a play, then simply put it into words, remembering that in fiction you can dispense with certain scenes in a single sentence spoken elsewhere. Try it and see how you come out. You'll probably fail the first time and the next, and the next, but therein you'll have no advantage over the hundreds of men and women who have found success. Just keep plugging away.

We Hope So, But—

Here is a letter from a Denver contributor regarding our recent suggestion that there was coming to be a demand for stories for children acted by children. She writes:

> In the issue of August 24th of the Moving Picture World, I read with great interest what you had to say under the heading, "For the Kiddies." I have been a teacher in the public schools for over twenty-five years, and, of course, have the interest of these same "Kiddies" keenly at heart. I have often wondered why there were not more children's photoplays produced—by children's photoplays I mean plays that appeal directly to the child's mind, but not necessarily acted by a company of juvenile players.
> You say, "Don't rework old fairy stories, because the companies can do these better. Work for original themes or you'll waste time." Now during my twenty-five years of service in the schools I have come to know the things in storyland most children like best, and in that time I have read hundreds of stories to the kiddies, and consider myself a good judge of their taste in literature and drama. It is not the fairy tale alone that appeals to children. There are dozens of splendid stories which would make the most delightful photoplays, stories with beautiful lessons of heroism, chivalry, filial devotion, etc., which would appeal to young and old alike.
> Now it is not possible for the "companies" to know of all these masterpieces for the little ones. To be sure the ideas would not be original and the right to the reproduction would have to be secured, but why not borrow ideas from children's stories for feature plays as well as from grown-up masterpieces of literature? I should like to suggest the names of some delightful juvenile stories to the manufacturers, and feel sure that there are many teachers throughout the land that would be most happy to supplement my list with other names, and so aid in the uplift of the photoplay for the young.
> Would such a suggestion to the manufacturers be out of place and would they pay the slightest heed to it? What do you think of it?
> Before closing permit me to tell you how thoroughly I enjoy the Moving Picture World and of what an assistance its many helpful articles have been to me in my photoplaywriting. I read it from cover to cover every week, and find something worth the while in every line.

We do not think that there will be a market for adaptations for some time unless the temper of the manufacturers materially changes. We think that for the present the demand will be for stories suited to the children's companies, such as that maintained by the Lubin Company, and which is largely recruited from the little sons and daughters of the adult players. These productions, more for grown-ups than children, will in time lead to the purely child story, and eventually realize the Kalem idea of some two or three years ago in the special weekly release for children. Until that time the adaptation of child literature will largely be a labor of love and, on general principles, the adaptation never will be popular in the studios, where these can be made to better advantage than by the outside contributor.

INQUIRIES.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of studio addresses, kept up-to-date, will be sent if a stamped and addressed return envelope accompanies the request.

A. B. M.—The fruit grower's daughter in "The Punishment," and the girl in "The Spirit Awakened" was Miss Blanche Sweet. The wayward son who reformed in "The Black Sheep" was Charles West. The Waitress in "Trying to Fool Uncle," was Miss Clair McDowell. Lucien in "The Punishment," was Harry Hyde. Recent roles of Mack Sennett were the suitor in "Tomboy Bessie," and the title in "The Brave Hunters." Fred Mace was the stout comedian in "The Speed Demon," and the larger Frenchman in "Neighbors." Our identifier has no line on the others. Please send your name and address next time.

L. W.—What do you mean by "How many pictures of the same kind are made?" The Essanay Company does not identify the child nor the Little Sheriff in that play. The Anderson section of the Essanay Company is at Niles, Cal. Miss Mary Pickford was Lena in Biograph's "Lena and the Geese."

D. D.—Miss Helen Gardner heads her own company, working at Tappan, N. J. The first release will be made shortly, in the form of Cleopatra in five reels. In Biograph's "Blind Love," the faithful suitor was Ed. Dillon.

M. J. E.—Toodles, in Selig's "A Box Car Baby," was Lillian Wade. The Pathe question must be referred to that company. "When a Count Counted" is a Thanhouser, Miss Mignon Anderson was the stenographer. In Kalem's "The Bell of Penance," Knute Rahmn was the suitor of Miss Joyce. Her cousin (not sister), was Miss Jane Wolf. "A Life for a Kiss" was made by the American. We have not their casts. In future state name of maker, as many titles have been used by two or more companies.

M. C.—We do not know where the pictures mentioned were made. The leading woman in Lubin's "A Romance of the Coast," was Miss Ethel Clayton. No pictures are made in San Francisco. Melies is now working the Pacific Islands as very recently stated. Read back for details.

NO NAME—Name and address after this, please. It will not be printed. Lubin does not know the cast of "The Senorita's Butterfly." We cannot obtain Rex casts. Bobbie, in Eclair's "Because of Bobbie," was Clara Horton.

E. H. S.—Mack Sennet was the suitor in Biograph's "Tom Boy Bessie." State the Pathe question more definitely.

M. E. H.—Certainly you can come again. It's what the Answer Man is here for. E. J. Hayes is the Thanhouser player you ask for. He was Miss Anderson's father in "Old Dr. Judd," and the Bank President in "Vengeance is Mine." William Garwood was Bertie Cecil in the same company's "Under Two Flags." Wallace Reid was the Indian lover of Miss Robinson in Reliance's "Before the White Man Came." We can't get jobs for those missing players of yours.

C. W. B.—We do not find an Albert Morrison in recent Vitagraph casts. There is a James Morrison in that company. If you are a licensed exhibitor the Kalem Company will be glad to send you their Kalendar, and you cannot afford to be without it.

H. G. M.—Miss Blanche Sweet was the blonde in Biograph's "Man's Lust for Gold."

S. S. B.—The discrepancy between the published story and the published print is no doubt due to the necessity for getting the reel within the thousand feet release limit. You've got the essence of the idea. If a story is really out of the ordinary, it will sell, no matter who sends it in.

CAMERA X—Eclair, and we think Reliance, will develop your exposed film and furnish one or more prints. See advertisements for addresses. Any good photographer should be able to operate the motion camera after a little experience. It's a good plan to run an extra five feet through the camera and use this in pieces as test strips. If you can get nothing it's a sign you're not apt to have anything.

C. E. F.—Comedy, if it is real comedy, is apt to be the best seller, and so more profitable in the long run. Your second question is too broad. Your best instruction is a real study of the picture on the screen.

F. H. S.—"Flying A" has reference to the American Film Company's trade mark, which is a winged A. We have not yet heard of Miss Leonard having located with any company.

H. S. J.—Write Mr. Thorvald Solberg, Register of Copyrights, Washington, D. C., for the copyright information you seek.

ARDATH—Miss Eleanor Blanchard was the mother, and either Miss Bayne or Miss Stonehouse, the girl in Essanay's "A Corner in Whiskers." The cast does not make it plain which you mean. We do not obtain Rex casts. Wilfred Lucas was the thief in Biograph's "The Thief and the Girl." Miss La Badie was the girl. She is now a Thanhouser player. We do not answer questions as to relationships.

L. L. J.—See note above for reply to your question.

N. F.—We do not settle bets and it does not aid in insuring an answer to state that a wager has been made. Helen, in Biograph's "Helen's Marriage," was Miss Mabel Normand. Faro Kate, in "With the Enemy's Help," was Miss Mary Pickford.

C. W. H.—See last week for Bison 101. Film Supply handles certain brands. The Mutual Corporation is closely related and makes some of those brands. Keystone and Broncho are now listed by the Film Supply.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"THE INDELIBLE STAIN" (Selig), Sept. 12.—A picture wherein there are some fine scenes and strong dramatic situations. Thomas Santschi as the padre is at his best throughout. He is always particularly effective in these characters. It is a charming picture wherein the girl goes to the priest to inform him of her engagement. Frank Richardson, Bessie Eyton and Eugenie Besserer deserve special mention.

"THE ANCIENT PORT OF JAFFA" (Kalem), Sept. 11.—An interesting scenic, especially to Bible students. Among the more notable pictures are those of the dangers attending getting into and out of the port and the view of the house of Simon.

"DR SKINNEM'S WONDERFUL INVENTION" (Kalem), Sept. 11.—On the same reel as the foregoing. At the house where this reviewer saw this picture the exhibitor wisely ran other reels between the two, as obviously a film of this description would detract from the scenic by following immediately.

"THE LISTENERS' LESSON" (Essanay), Sept. 12.—A comedy based on the successful efforts of two city girls visiting in the country to "cut out" two country girls who had snubbed them. There is an amusing scene where the two city girls are seated in the grass with the two country boys. It is a fair comedy.

"THE HINDOO CURSE" (Vitagraph), Sept. 11.—A fair release, the chief quality, perhaps, being on the spectacular side, free use being made of three elephants, which are employed in an escape over a sandy plain. There are elaborate settings and many men are employed.

"THE FIGHTING INSTINCT" (Selig), Sept. 10.—In this story, written and played, as well as produced, by William Duncan, the relation of the title to the piece is not quite clear. The picture gets over, but it depends for its interest on the views of the sand-covered hills and valleys and on a fierce hand-to-hand fight down the side of a steep. Marshall Stedman plays the father and Myrtle Stedman the daughter.

"BLACK BEAUTY" (Pathe), Sept. 11.—A tale of a horse, or rather one in which several horses were involved, taken from the poem of the same name. It is interesting. The horses, however, should all or none have had the white star in the forehead.

"SCENES ALONG THE SALERNO COAST" (Cines), Sept. 10.—Pictures of very interesting scenery, marred by poor photography—in other words, the pictures had insufficient light in them or behind them.

"THE CONSPIRACY OF CATILINE" (Cines), Sept. 10.—A historical drama of the period of 66 to 62 B. C. The picture will undoubtedly have more interest for those who are familiar with the history of the period. It is a meritorious production, there being a large company and adequate settings.

"THE STRANGER AND THE TAXICAB" (Edison), Sept. 11.—Fair comedy. Willis Secord has the part of the jealous lover and Gertrude McCoy that of the girl whose brother caused so much harsh feeling. Edward O'Connor has the role of the butler, and he helps out all that he is permitted.

"THE STREET SINGER" (Kalem), Sept. 13.—Alice Joyce is featured in this picture as an opera singer, who as a child is taken in and protected and raised by a woman and her son, the latter of whom as the child gets older takes her to a music teacher. The singer is sent to Europe for study as the protegee of a wealthy woman, and on her successful debut on her return the patroness tries to keep the singer from seeking out the protector of her childhood. It is all a pretty story and very well done. One especially effective scene is that of Miss Joyce sitting at a harp in a dim light.

"BETTY AND THE ROSES" (Lubin), Sept. 12.—A picture not materially strengthened by a view of Miss Hawley in her nightie and marred by an unnecessarily protracted soul kiss as a finale. The action was melodramatic. The views of the interior of the country mansion were particularly elaborate—luxurious, in fact. There were one or two fine bits of comedy.

"THE DAM BUILDER" (Edison), Sept. 13.—Charles Ogle, George Lessey, Robert Brower and Edna Flugrath have plenty to do in this melodrama, with a background of a great dam in the making. The story will hold.

"BLIND LOVE" (Biograph), Sept. 12.—Strong drama, and at the same time wholesome drama, carrying a lesson that will serve in all communities. It is a story of a girl in a small community, fascinated by the scoundrel of good appearancee, who passes over the plain young man who had formerly held her affections. She is one of the fortunate ones who is enabled shortly to get rid of her mistaken alliance and find happiness in the companionship of a man worthy of her. It is all well done.

"A TRUSTEE OF THE LAW" (Lubin), Sept. 14.—A dramatic picture telling a love story of the South. Its hero is a sheriff, who has arrested a negro, suspected of murdering a brother of the picture's heroine whom the sheriff loves. This negro is the "trustee of the law" in the sheriff's eyes and he does his best to protect him from the mob, led on by his sweetheart's other brother. It is a very naturally conducted picture, with good action all through. The situation, characters and backgrounds are all freshly interesting and it makes a very commendable offering; is a strong picture.

"HONORS DIVIDED" (Cines), Sept. 14.—There are situations that depend on purely local peculiarities. The atmosphere of European life is in subtle ways, which it is hard to define, different from life here. We see pictures occasionally that we can't wholly understand. They are pictures dealing with family relationships usually; but pictures dealing with political situations or the relationship of a sovereign with his people, now and then, fall into this class. They assume in the spectator a knowledge that our experience hasn't furnished to us. They don't affect us deeply. We don't know why and the feeling has grown that foreign pictures are not so good for us as our own. But when any picture deals with what are called universal things, it makes no difference where they are made. Simple religion, with all things that spring from it; family affections, etc.; love when it is simply pictured; and patriotism; these are all universal things. The picture of these things will be understood all around the world. We take as much interest in the story of Ruth and Naomi as though it had been written in America.

This picture is a love story in a universal atmosphere; it shows no earmarks of its foreign make. It is simple, graceful and pleasing as to Italians so to Americans. The hero is a playwright. He divides his honors with his sweetheart, who had completed his manuscript while he is sick and delirious, in order to get it in on time. The hero and heroine are very acceptable; the acting is natural throughout and the action clear and interesting. It makes a good offering.

"STERN PAPA" (Biograph), Sept. 16.—A picture of farcical characters that made a large audience on Broadway shout with laughter. The fun comes from the get-ups and the acting.

"LOVE'S MESSENGER" (Biograph), Sept. 16.—The very farcical atmosphere of this picture saves it, as salt does bread, and keeps it very amusing. It is on the same reel with the above and both were thoroughly enjoyed. The kitchen maid and the French cook are deep in love. There's a "love's messenger," a biscuit with a note in it. The note was for the maid; the husband gets the biscuit and misunderstands.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 38, Sept. 16.—The topical has its usual interest. One good item is a picture of the two little Spanish princes. There are a number of athletic contests included.

"NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER" (Essanay), Sept. 17.—An artist (Francis X. Bushman) painting near the shore falls asleep and has a dream, which is the story of the picture. There are two girls in the dream; one is a human sweetheart, one is a mermaid, Neptune's daughter, played by Martha Russell. There always will be something unnatural in mermaids and gods in motion pictures; but in a fantasy such as this they become acceptable even while very unconvincing. Miss Russell gives character to the picture by her interpretation of the sea-maiden turned human and out of water. The natural ending is for her to go back to it and drown. It is set near a rocky shore and gives views of waves breaking quietly. A fair offering.

"POPULAR BETTY" (Vitagraph), Sept. 14.—A summer hotel farce with a good, fresh idea that makes it so. Miss C. K. Young plays Betty, a society girl who "escaped" to a hotel where she wasn't known. Miss Dorothy Kelly and the other girls at the place are jealous of Betty and this, with what comes of it, makes the picture acceptably dramatic. Mr. Harold Wilson, Mr. James Young and Mr. Chas. E. Bennet have roles. Miss Daisy R. Stone is the authoress; Mr. J. Young, the producer.

"THE FORTUNE IN A TEACUP" (Vitagraph), Sept. 14.—On the same reel is this whimsical love story in which Miss Rosemary Theby plays the lead. Miss Norma Talmadge plays her friend who reads her fortune by the leaves in a cup of tea. Earle Williams plays the lover and the interpreter of the "fortune." It is easy enough to be "far from home" and "across water," if there is a handy brook and one wants to take a long walk. Miss G. B. Winsat wrote the little comedy. Albert W. Hale produced it. The two make a good offering.

"NEVER AGAIN" (Lubin), Sept. 13.—A dream farce in which the papier mache heads often used in Mardi Gras processions are used with good effect. The man who dreams this fearful nightmare is never again going to drink. There is a good deal of freshness in it and it distinctly makes fun. We commend it as a light offering.

"BUSTER AND THE PIRATES" (Lubin), Sept. 13.—This is one of the Lubin pictures by the children's company. As usual it is Buster's dream and there were some in the audience who got much good amusement out of it. These pictures are still a novelty.

"THE PARASITE" (Kalem), Sept. 16.—There is no lack of fresh dramatic interest in this picture in spite of its old situation. It is strongly handled and very natural in its acting and although the situation is in itself not probable, the picture holds convincingly. A scamp finds his double supposedly dead on a Mexican battlefield and steals his clothes and papers in order to impersonate him. But the double isn't dead. The interest comes from the kind of reputation we see the scamp building up. It makes a very good offering.

"THE SLEEPER" (Lubin), Sept. 16.—The "Sleeper" is the name of a mine. The locating of the claim was only a joke on the part of drunken cowboys who noticed the old prospector asleep; but the claim turned out very rich. The picture's big feature is the stampede of all classes and conditions of men to the new goldfields and the big tent city that springs in a night. Without a very new outline the picture is kept fresh by its handling and by its natural acting. It is a picture that will widely interest.

"A VITAGRAPH ROMANCE" (Vitagraph), Sept. 18.—A dandy offering that we feel sure will please. It tells a good story convincingly and uses the Vitagraph plant as a background and in a very interesting way. The romance has its beginning at a seaside resort of which we have some pretty glimpses. It is here that a young author (James Morrison) meets and falls in love with the daughter of a senator (Clara Kimball Young). The senator (Edward Kimball) refuses his consent and sends the girl to boarding school where we find Flora Finch as the principal. There's a moonlight elopement from the school, troubled waters for the young people and then they get a job with the Vitagraph Company where at length the forgiving senator finds them. The Vitagraph scenes are very good. In the office, Messrs. W. T. Rock, A. E. Smith and J. Stewart Blackton are in consultation. Mr. S. M. Spedon enters for a moment just before the senator is introduced. The visitor is conducted through the yard to the studio where one of Miss Florence Turner's pictures is being made. This he interrupts to greet his daughter right in the middle of a scene. Mr. James Young is both author and producer and has made an excellent offering.

"THE RESCUE, CARE AND EDUCATION OF BLIND BABIES" (Edison), Sept. 14.—This is unquestionably a rare film. The picture has been reviewed at length in The World. It only remains for this reviewer to say that no exhibitor should fail to give his patrons a full opportunity to see it. It will bring home to many a phase of life that perhaps they never before have given a moment's consideration. The film shows just what the title indicates, and in the course of the picture there are moments of deep pathos—and sharper perhaps than would be drawn out by the best drama of a month. It makes a strong appeal to the sympathies of intelligent men and women.

"FOR HER LORD" (C. G. P. C.), Sept. 13.—This black and white picture is a dramatic interpretation of an incident of the Chouan uprising following the French Revolution. The interest is sharp throughout and the work of the entire cast is of the best.

"THE LATE HARRIET QUIMBY'S FLIGHT ACROSS THE ENGLISH CHANNEL" (C. G. P. C.), Sept. 13.—The film shows the start of the flight. Other scenes are of the preparations and of the landing, some of which manifestly were taken at a time when the light was better than when the start actually was made. It is a short picture, a filler for the foregoing.

"A RAILROAD LOCHINVAR" (Kalem), Sept. 14.—This is fine drama, with an excellent comedy ending. There is one of the famous Kalem railroad scenes, in which two locomotives are used in a pursuit. It is a pretty story, and it is well done.

"BILLY McGRATH'S LOVE LETTERS" (Essanay), Sept. 13.—John Steppling and Miss Beverly Bayne make good comedy in this picture. It is a story of the mischief-making younger sister, who in revenge puts feminine trifles in the pocket of Billy, and this quite naturally starts trouble which results in the return of love letters. More trouble follows when the little one, playing postoffice, distributes along the street some of the returned letters. All ends well.

"THE SUBSTITUTE MODEL" (Selig), Sept. 16.—Taking advantage of one of the big fashion shows, Hobart Bosworth has written and produced a story with a dramatic climax. Eugenie Besserer takes the title role, and she, with Bettie Harte, who plays the part of the sister requiring the services of an eye specialist, carries the brunt of the story. The work of Miss Harte in the final scene, when the bandage is removed from her eyes, is well worth seeing. The picture will be of deep interest to women by reason of the costume display alone. It will interest all on account of the play itself.

Independent

"WON BY A CALL" (Nestor), Sept. 20.—A young doctor arrives at a little town in the West and starts his career with falling in love with a girl loved by someone else. The girl reciprocates the doctor's love. The father sides with the disappointed lover. A scheme is rigged whereby the girl is put to bed as having been hurt, and the doctor, being the only one within twenty miles, is called in. Telling the ex-sweetheart the girl will probably never walk again, there is half of a clear field. Inducing the father to believe the doctor will effect a cure, the field is entirely cleared. While there is nothing novel in the plot, the acting is acceptable.

"SWEET ALICE, BEN BOLT" (Imp), Sept. 19.—Ben and Alice are shown as children and then as grown-ups. The press gang gets Ben and takes him on board a British man-of-war. Alice, setting out to look for Ben, is hit by a swinging boom. She is discovered by the captain of a British man-of-war and brought on board. Later, when war is declared between England and France, the girl is put ashore in France. Ben, going ashore for water, is wounded by French soldiers and makes his way to the house where Alice is staying. As she has suffered a loss of memory by reason of the blow from the boom, she does not recognize Ben. She is brought home, however, and apparently her memory is restored by old associations. The play is not without interest.

"FLO'S DISCIPLINE" (Victor), Sept. 20.—Owen Moore and Florence Lawrence have the leads in a comedy which is not notable for its strength. There are only three other adults in the cast. A troop of boys pose as members of a boarding school.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A WIDOW" (Powers), Sept. 18.—Some very young girls, miffed because some young men decide there should be a chaperone taken on an outing, rebel and organize a "No Men Wanted" club. The men try to get back into the good graces of the girls, and have some difficulty doing so. There is a little fun in the process.

"TOMMY'S PLAYMATE" (Lux), Sept. 13.—A melodramatic story in which the chief incident is the shutting up by a crazy man of a child in a hut in a lonesome woods and of the discovery of the place of concealment by the faithful dog of the little fellow. The scenes are laid in fine surroundings. The dog is a feature in himself.

"UNDINE" (Thanhouser), Sept. 24.—These two reels were reviewed in the World of last week. "Undine" is a beautiful production. No Independent exhibitor should fail to give his people ample opportunity to see it.

"LOST—A HUSBAND" (Rex), Sept. 15.—The central idea presented by this picture has furnished other pictures; but it hasn't yet been used too often and is surely amusing. The wife of the irritable husband goes to her sister's for a while and the grouchy man finds that things don't go smoothly at home. Miss Marion Leonard plays the lead in several pretty dresses and some of its scenes are fine. The picture, as a whole, impresses one as artificial. More than once the leading man told the camera what he was going to do. To do this doesn't help one whit; it is a bad mistake. It adds positively nothing that is worth while and spoils every scene where it is noticeable. The best asset of the picture is Miss Leonard and her frocks. It is not a convincing picture.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY," Sept. 11.—The topical this week has a number of very interesting items. Perhaps the best of them shows a realistic sham battle in California fought by regulars and photographed in part from an aeroplane moving above the field. The "Who's Who in Stageland" item give Walter Whiteside with his wife and daughter at their country home. Among the other items are: Columbus Centennial parade; National swimming championship races at Chicago; the launching of the "Jupiter" at Mare Island, Cal., the biggest collier ever made; the enthroning of the new Bishop of Truro in England; the Curtiss bi-plane making a sensational flight; and a few views of the Elgin automobile races.

"THE RANCHMAN'S AWAKENING" (Bison, Universal), Sept. 17.—The ranchman is made to wake up to a knowledge of all that his faithful, self-denying wife has been doing for him. The picture first makes known to us the quality of the wife's devotion and then introduces the usual fascinating widow. The wife has her hours of misery; but in a pretty dress becomes so attractive to the men that her husband's eyes are opened. He awakes to the fact that no woman can be a kitchen drudge and a parlor belle at the same time. There are good things in the picture, with much that is not fresh; but it is perfectly clear and it gets over. The best thing about the picture is the homely wholesomeness of the situation. It will stir sympathies even though it has been often used. The photography is also good.

"A WESTERN VACATION" (Nestor), Sept. 18.—A ranch life farce that develops some amusing situations, but that, in general outline, follows other elopement pictures of this kind. It is cleverly handled, at least toward the end, and gives one or two lovely scenes. It will amuse and makes a fair light offering.

"ONLY A PRIVATE" (Lux), Sept. 20.—This is a story of an attempt to bribe a private soldier by a spy who was curious to know how much powder was in reserve in the barracks. The soldier needed money to prevent the foreclosure of a mortgage on his parents' home and agreed to permit the spy to enter the powder magazine when he should be on guard. He changed his mind at the pinch and refused. The spy sneaked back, stabbed the sentry, and entered the building. After getting his information he decided he would fire the place. It did seem as if he would have saved time had he done that first. The sentry recovered consciousness and entered the magazine and grappled with his assailant. The flames brought the soldiers, who extinguished the blaze. There was no explosion. The soldier was a hero. His comrades paid the mortgage.

"BENOIT'S FORTUNE" (Great Northern), Sept. 21.—Fine comedy. A large man who plays the cabinet maker suddenly become wealthy is a comedian who makes a lot of fun. The entire cast is good.

"THE FORECLOSURE" (American), Sept. 19.—Good straight drama by the premier company. The acting is restrained and the photography excellent.

"THE LIFE OF A ROSE" (Solax), Sept. 20.—A pictorialized poem, in which there is a measure of drama. In one case a girl, portraying a cripple, was attired in male garb. She carried her role excellently, though why a girl should have been chosen for the part is difficult to understand. This custom results in enforced and unnecessary artificiality.

"THE PICTURESQUE HUDSON RIVER" (Solax), Sept. 20.—On the same reel as the foregoing are some excellent views of the Hudson, evidently taken near the source. The river, very narrow, winds between great cliffs. There are also scenes of Winter on the Hudson and of ice sports.

"THE FUNERAL OF GENERAL BOOTH" (Gaumont), Sept. 21.—This topical picture gives views of the General speaking and of the scenes at his funeral. There will be interest in the enormous crowds alone. Also a good idea will be given of the vast organization of the Salvation Army in England.

"THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN" (Gaumont), Sept. 21.—Interesting views of the great observatory at Paris and of the recent eclipse of the sun.

"BAD PETE'S GRATITUDE" (American), Sept. 25.—This cannot be said to be strong drama. It is not interesting.

"AT THE FOOT OF THE LADDER" (Thanhouser), Sept. 22.—Good comedy. Father desires daughter to marry his partner, mother desires daughter to marry a society young man, daughter desires to marry a reporter; daughter wins out.

"MARY'S CHAUFFEUR" (Majestic), Sept. 22.—Mr. Prior and Miss Trunnelle have the leads in a good comedy. The theme is old, but it is handled in a most interesting manner.

"THE REDEMPTION" (Reliance), Sept. 21.—Strong drama, based on the jealousy of a husband of an unknown brother-in-law. The husband is inclined to melodrama, but the situation is strong and perhaps justifies the interpretation given.

"THE HORSE-THIEF'S DAUGHTER" (Nestor), Sept. 16.—Well-chosen scenes give background to this story which, as presented, has much that has been shown in other Nestors, but which has the perennial freshness of an effectively constructed picture. The figures that the story deals with are well known; they are not living characters; but the kaleidoscopic change of incident makes a new story. The horse-thief's daughter, as usual, falls in love with the deputy sheriff, and the father dies of heart disease just as the gang is captured. It is naturally acted, full of action and well photographed.

"THE DUMMY DIRECTOR" (Comedy), Sept. 16.—A picture of business life. It tells an absorbingly interesting story and opens in a down town office just as an illegal merger is formed to control the price of foodstuffs. The dummy director is an old bookkeeper, who is made nominal owner of a large block of the stock merely for the purpose of deceiving the authorities. The old man's daughter is a stenographer in the office and the president causes the girl's downfall. The plot is dramatically effective and clear. There is no real character drawing, the object being merely to bring out the situation, but in this it succeeds very well indeed. An interesting offering with substantial merit.

"KINGS IN EXILE" (Gaumont), Sept. 19.—Such pictures as this, and there are this week others of the same high quality, are the best, the only effective answer to the charge that moving picture makers lack imagination. It is a two-reel offering and shows a struggle in the heart of a royal prince whom duty calls one way and love the other. He succumbs to love and abdicates in favor of his younger brother. It will mean more to European spectators than to Americans; but it is very effectively put on and makes a good story. The picture opens in Paris, where the prince is living in temporary exile with his mother, and carries to Biarritz, the famously beautiful seaside resort of France. The views of this watering place that are given are lovely. It is a picture that will excite enthusiasm, especially among the critical-minded. The first reel is more human and more effective than the second, which is very romantic; but both are good. It can be safely advertised as something better than usual.

"FAR AWAY FIELDS" (Rex), Sept. 19.—A poetic picture full of lovely scenes, whose object is to contrast the paths of the life that may be called homely with the more graceful-seeming life of silks and brocades in a beautiful palace. This contrast is subtly developed and the picture makes a very satisfying as well as substantial offering. The plot is simple and the story is kept clear. The two sides of the picture are connected dramatically by bringing one of two sisters from the far away fields to the palace, where she finds how empty and vain its graceful life is. When she returns, quite forlorn, she finds that her younger sister has married the shepherd lad, her former sweetheart, and is happy. Miss Lois Webber plays the ambitious sister; Miss Cleo Ridgley the other sister and Mr. Phillips Smalley the shepherd. The photographs of these poetic scenes are excellent and make a good offering, one that will please everywhere.

"BLIND MUSICIAN" (Imp).—Sept. 21.—A picture in which a blind music teacher goes to his daughter's assistance with a revolver. The situation has dramatic possibilities which are pretty well brought out and since the music teacher is an old man and is well acted by J. Ober it is made believable and effective. Miss Vivian Prescott, as the daughter, makes good use of her part, as does Mr. Herbert Brennon, who plays the unwelcome suitor. With the comedy on the same reel, the release is commendable as an offering to the public. It will be welcome.

"EXCHANGING LABELS" (Imp), Sept. 23.—A comedy on the same reel with the above. It is very slight, but short, merely a good joke story put into pictures. It is played very naturally by Mr. Pollard, Miss Fisher and Mr. Eugene Kelly.

"THE MILLIONAIRE COP" (Imp), Sept. 16.—A bright and clever farce of political life, quite fresh as to its idea and delightfully acted. King Baggot plays the cop. His father is a social leader, who doesn't want his son to go into politics, and the son gets the district leader to make him a bicycle cop in order to bring the father (Wm. Shay) to terms. The old man is soon caught speeding. Miss Violet Horner has a very pretty part as the son's sweetheart, while Miss Mabel Halsey is charming as a widow, whom the father loves. It makes a very acceptable offering, one that will please all kinds of people.

"MY WIFE'S AWAY, HURRAH!" (Eclair), Sept. 17.—A farce of domestic life by the American company. The stingy man's wife wasn't really in the country; she was, unknown to her husband, his darky cook. To learn that she was deaf and dumb pleased the old man. It is a picture with many pretty scenes and lovely portraiture and the action is very lively. There is too much sameness in the action and not enough change in incident; but the idea is good and the closing scenes are very interesting. It makes a fair light offering.

"FILIAL LOVE" (Eclair, American), Sept. 19.—The opening scenes of this two-reel picture were photographed in Pittsburgh and are dandy views of a big foundry and near it. The story takes for its subject the love of a boy for his father, who is a workman in the big foundry and who is unjustly accused of murdering his foreman. The larger part of the film is devoted to showing the adventures of the boy on his way to obtain a pardon. It is full of lovely scenes; but as a whole, it fails to convince. This is partly due to the fact that there was some awkwardness in stating the situation and it is partly because the little boy didn't succeed in convincing himself that he was playing a real story. The result is that we lose all interest in the boy's object in making the journey to Washington, and are held solely by the scenes of the trip. These are unusually beautiful. It will please many.

"A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE" (Eclair, Paris), Sept. 15.—The well-remembered and very amusing Bill, recently with the Lux Company, plays the lead in this picture as suitor for the hand of a rich American girl who wants someone who can awaken in her "a great emotion." No other suitor could stir the lady's emotions; but Bill brings two lions. As a result, the house is turned topsy-turvy, but the girl has felt the emotion and accepts the fortunate young man. It gets over in fine shape and makes a desirable offering. It needs a growler sound effect; there will be plenty of use for such an instrument.

"AROUND CONSTANTINOPLE" (Eclair, Paris), Sept. 15.—On the same reel is found this excellent travelog; views seen from the harbor. It is a well photographed and interesting series of glimpses of a city that is attracting a great deal of attention.

"FOR LOVE OF HER" (Reliance), Sept. 14.—Gertrude Robinson as the daughter of a choleric father who loses his memory, and Hector Dion as a misjudged and unlucky lover, play under difficulties in this loose-jointed melodrama, which loses its strength from a lack of clearness and cohesion. Scenes on a canal and in the Hudson River near New York compensate in a measure for the faulty plot.

"ORATOR, KNIGHT AND COW CHARMER" (Thanhouser), Sept. 15.—A well-acted comedy in which a girl cartoonist (Miss Anderson) and Casey, a politician (Mr. Russell) with the help of a cow and a real, live mouse furnish some genuine amusement. A scene in which the cow trees the girl is particularly laughable. No less so is Casey's rage and retaliation when having rescued the girl she turns his gallantry to ungrateful advantage by drawing a comic of him as "Orator, Knight and Cow Charmer." He sends a mouse to her in a box of candy for revenge and marries her to finish the joke. The pictures are well composed.

"THE MAIL CLERK'S TEMPTATION" (Thanhouser), Sept. 17.—The heroine, a hotel clerk (Marguerite Snow) wavering in her choice between a drummer and the mail clerk, drives the latter to rifle a mail sack. That he thinks better in the nick of time and returns the stolen mail does not seem to satisfy his conscience because later he attempts suicide. The drama, admirably presented up to this point and of strong interest, loses something from the weak motive for suicide. The final action would have been better had the hero found difficulties in returning what he had stolen. The hotel lobby is an unusually well-planned interior and the by-plays are skillfully introduced.

"THE TWO SOULS" (Thanhouser), Sept. 20.—This presents the tragedy of a man who commits murder in a quarrel and of a girl dogged by poverty and ill health. A good horse race quickens the interest at the outset of the action and some strong traits of character in the man serve much to relieve a generally dark atmosphere. The human touches and pathos in the most dramatic situations have a strong appeal.

"SUNDERED TIES" (Broncho), Sept. 18.—This drama of the war between the states contains a battle which is so utterly convincing and so carefully worked out in its details that the film ranks very high among exceptionally good productions. From the first view of the field of action to the final one in the field hospital the picture unfolds a succession of gripping scenes and dramatic incidents. On such background is depicted the struggle of a young Union officer whose convictions have kept him in the Northern army against natural family ties, which would bind him to the Southern cause. At the outbreak of war his sweetheart turns him away, his father joins the Confederate army and later his brother, a small boy, is killed during the battle, which occurs near his home. No legitimate opportunity is lost to show the constant clash between the hero's sense of duty and love of his people. The story moves logically and easily, it is nowhere marred or strained by irrelevant accidents, and the acting is evenly balanced throughout. Comic relief is introduced through an old, black butler and the inevitable "mammy," and they handle their parts particularly well at the closing scenes, which show the happy reunion of the sundered family. There is no other answer to the whole production than one of sincere praise.

"THE DOCTOR'S DOUBLE" (Bison, N. Y. M. P. Co.), Sept. 20.—A double role picture in which the leading man plays both the doctor and the bandit, for whose sins he only escapes punishment by grace of his wife turning dectective and, disguised as a man, encompassing the capture of the real bandit. A Mexican wine garden, in which this happy incident occurs, offers an interesting setting. Swift action characterizes all of the film.

"THE PENALTY" (Bison, N. Y. Motion Picture Co.), Sept. 17.—The parts of Thunder Cloud, a renegade Indian soldier, and that of his accomplice, a discharged comrade, are well handled in this drama of the frontier. An Indian attack on the stockade furnishes a novel spectacle in the destruction of the braves by means of a number of bombs planted in the ground before the gate. Thunder Cloud escapes this death trap, but is blinded and meets his end in the desert. The action is spirited from the beginning, and many of the scenes, particularly those attending the passage of a wagon train in the mountains, are extremely picturesque.

ESSANAY DRAMATIC SUBJECTS.

The Essanay Company during the past three weeks has completed a number of fine dramatic subjects, unusual in plot and grippingly portrayed. Among these are "The Way of the Transgressor," a melodrama of an Oriental nature and showing scenes of Chicago's Chinatown; "The Warning Hand," an extraordinary melodrama containing some fine examples of double-exposure; "Sunshine," a melodrama that excels Essanay's famous picture "Out of the Night," released some months ago, and which portrays the story by double-exposure throughout; "The Moving Finger," a superb drama of gripping intensity, and "Chains," one of the greatest dramas of the year. These, together with the scenic, educational and sparkling comedies Essanay is famous for, insure weekly bookings of more than ordinary interest to exhibitors.

PLEASED WITH ESSANAY.

The Essanay Company's announcement of "Five-a-Week," beginning Wednesday, Sept. 25th, has brought a flood of letters from exhibitors throughout the country expressing satisfaction and delight. To quote from one "booster" in Baltimore: "Your fifth weekly release cannot come any too soon to suit me. I make a feature of Essanay nights on Wednesday of each week, and your new one just hits in the right spot. Keep them coming, and more power to you." This is just a sample of the many communications the Essanay Company is receiving, and it is a source of the deepest satisfaction to know that the new release will "hit in a good many right spots" the world over.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

Baxter Morton.

As was noted in the pages of last week's issue, Mr. Baxter Morton, formerly general manager of the Nicholas Power Company, has passed into the Great Beyond. The editor of this department had for and with Mr. Morton such warm friendship, and such close personal relations that he cannot refrain from voicing, through his own department, his regret and grief at the untimely taking away of so brilliant a man. Mr. Baxter Morton was indeed a remarkable personality. Few men possessed so clear an understanding, and so thorough a knowledge of so many different branches of learning. Few men active in the business world, possessed so few enemies and so many friends. A friendship with Baxter Morton was a thing to be valued; it was one of the good things of life. But he is gone. His barque has set sail on the Great Journey and has vanished in the shadows of the unknown, leaving behind a wide circle of friends who will miss his presence, and mourn his departure.

More Foolish Laws.

A small city in Texas has just passed an ordinance regulating the construction and operation of moving picture theaters. A portion of the section, bearing on the operating room, reads as follows:

> Section 15. That the picture machine shall be placed in an enclosure or house made of or lined with fireproof material, thoroughly ventilated to the outside of the building, and large enough for the operator to walk freely on either side or back of the machine. Such enclosure or house shall have no openings into the auditorium other than the opening where the light for the pictures is emitted, to be not larger than six (6) inches high by twelve (12) inches long, and operator's window to be not larger than twelve (12) inches high by four (4) inches wide, and these openings must be provided with fireproof coverings, or doors, arranged to close by strong springs, and to be held open by a fine combustible cord which shall be easily in reach of the operator so that it can be released by hand, which doors must be constructed so that they can be securely closed. Furthermore, if said electrical inspector shall decide that the arrangements are such as would require it, such doors must be so arranged that they may be released automatically. Only one entrance to enclosure permitted, same to be not more than five and one-half feet high by two feet wide, and such entrance shall open into some other part of the building or theater than the main auditorium, and be arranged in accordance with the above requirements. No electrical fixtures or material of any kind shall be permitted in the operating booth other than the picture machine and its accessories.

This ordinance contains the same old bewhiskered, mouldy chestnuts, which have done duty under the guise of laws for lo, these many years. It says that "the machines shall be placed in an enclosure, or a house made of, or lined with fireproof material, and thoroughly ventilated to the outside of the building." There is an abundance of room for argument there. "Fireproof" might consist of one thickness of ordinary tin, nailed to wooden joist, and still satisfy the provisions of this "ordinance." "Thoroughly ventilated" might mean almost anything, according to the ideas of the individual. It is strange that city councils are still passing such fossilized jokes, and dignifying them by the name of laws. I might also add that thorough ventilation, viewed merely as ventilation, might be one thing, and carrying off smoke from a film fire might be quite another thing. Thorough ventilation could be accomplished by blowing a stream of air through an opening in the front wall into, and through, the operating room, and on into the auditorium, but this would be a fine condition if a fire happened, wouldn't it? Why not use just a little horse sense, and stipulate a vent flue of ample size to carry off all smoke in time of fire, giving proper dimension of such a pipe, which same has been published in the Projection Department of this paper, from whence it may be had at any time. It is by this "ordinance," gravely ordered, that the observation port shall not be larger than 12 inches high by 4 inches wide. By enacting such an unwise and utterly useless provision as this, the city council has perpetrated an outrage on the manager, on the operator, and on the audience, but the most asinine part of the whole business is that they have stood this little inadequate 4 x 12 port up on its end. It would be bad enough if it were 4 inches high by 12 inches wide, but 12 inches high by 4 inches wide means that the operator must get his face right up almost against the wall in order to have a view of all his picture at one time, unless the throw be a very long one, or the picture quite small. As has been pointed out in this department, almost times without number one of the prime essentials to good projection is that the operator shall have a clear, unobstructed view of his entire picture at all times, when seated, or standing, in ordinary operating position. This he cannot possibly have with an observation port 4 inches wide. In case of fire there will be plenty of smoke and flame coming out of a 4 x 12 hole if the shutter doesn't close. The audience will be alarmed and stampede just as quickly as though the hole were three times that size. The ordinance provides for shutters for these openings, though not in any adequate way. There is little sense in restricting the size of the operating room door to 2 feet wide and 5½ feet high. Granted that that is probably big enough to serve the purpose, still why solemnly enact that particular size into law? What difference would it make if a door of standard dimensions were used? In another place the ordinance prohibits the use of motors for running the machine. Wouldn't it have been more wise to prohibit motors, except where the installation is approved by the electrical department of the city? New York City is now approving motors on such machines as the Powers 6A, Standard, and Simplex. I am not sure about the Edison and Motiograph, but I believe they are not yet approved, for the reason that the film is not wholly enclosed. This particular city council has, like many another city council sought to enact a law to control something about which the law-makers knew little or nothing. They apparently have gotten hold of a lot of ordinances from different cities and hashed them up, picking out what they thought best; but they seem to have failed to seek any expert advice of any kind whatsoever. It seems to me about time this particular brand of foolishness be stopped.

If operators in cities where a law of this kind is about to be passed will secure a copy of the proposed ordinance and send it to the Projection Department, it will be criticised and any foolish provisions it may contain; it will be rewritten into common sense, and submitted in practical form. That is one of the things this department is for and we shall be glad to lend any assistance possible among those lines.

Setting the Shutter.

Mr. William Batterson, Elite Theater, Stromsburg, Neb,, contributes the following:

> I often see in the Projection Department, where some one is asking how to set a revolving shutter, and as most of your replies to those questions are similar, I suppose the principle of shutter setting on all machines is about the same. When I start a new Edison machine, I always make preparation so that it will be an easy matter to set the shutter when I have to take the mechanism apart to put in new parts or to clean and adjust it. I go about it in this way. Take, for instance, the three-wing shutter. First, I draw a line exactly in the center of the wide blade, from the hub to the rim, using a sharp scratch awl, so that the line will be permanent. Next I frame the carriage up and down until I find the point where it has completed exactly half of its travel, and with the scratch-awl I make a line across the film guard, just at the top of the aperture, using the same as a sort of straight edge. Now I put the shutter on the shaft and turn the set screw in the hub so that it will meet the key way and I fasten the shutter on the shaft there. Now I stand above the machine and sight down along the aperture plate to the intermittent sprocket, and get my eye on the first sprocket tooth that stands clear of the aperture plate. This sprocket tooth must be the first one in a set of four which pull the film down while the screen is dark. I count this as tooth No. 1. I now turn the flywheel until the next tooth takes the place of the first one, and this is No. 2. Turn the flywheel again and the next sprocket, No. 3, should be stopped in exactly the place where No. 1 was before the flywheel was turned. Leave the machine right there and loosen the three little screws which hold the blades to the hub, and turn the blades until the line made on the wide blade is right in the center of the lens tube; set the screws tight and the job is done, and if one is careful to follow directions exactly the shutter will be as nearly perfect as possible. Here is another method I use sometimes. On the front of the shutter shaft (outside shutter), is a small collar put on with a set screw. This is, of course, to keep the shutter shaft from slipping back towards the machine. Get that collar loose and shove the shaft back and it will turn, independent of the machine. Turn the blades of the shutter until the large set screw in the hub is in line with the line that we made on the wide blade, and fasten the blades on the hub there. Frame the machine to the center of its travel, count out the three sprockets, put the shutter on the shaft, turn the set screw into the key way, put the line on the wide blade in the center of the lens tube pull the shaft out where it belongs, fasten the collar, and the shutter should be O. K. I was sorry to read in the last issue of the World that the Hand-book would not be ready for about sixty days, but I suppose it will be better than ever. We get several trade papers at our theater, but there is nothing fills the place of "Old Reliable," the Moving Picture World. The Projection Department and Advertising for Exhibitors are the pages interesting us most at present, and I have certainly gained a lot of knowledge through the Projection Department.

We are obliged to Friend Batterson for the excellent description of his method for setting the Edison outside shutter. I think it is plain enough that anyone can understand and follow the directions. Yes, the new Hand-book will make the old one look like a joke. Our only regret is that we have been compelled to add a dollar to the price. The new book will contain almost two hundred illustrations, and will, I believe, contain almost, if not quite, four hundred pages. I feel sure the book will be such as will not only command wide sale in this country, but will also be popular in English speaking Europe. The first book sold almost to the same mark, and was still going out at the rate of from five to ten a day, when the edition was exhausted. It would probably have easily passed the 10,000 mark. We are, of course, glad you like the Moving Picture World, and naturally I am well pleased to have you appreciate and commend the Projection Department.

Bartlesville.

Oklahoma, contributes the following:

I have not propounded any questions as yet, but am not so wise that I don't have to be shown once in a while. On page 878, August 31st issue, I believe Iowa's troubles lie in his projection lens. It seems to me it contains moisture, or he may clean it and then get too much oil on his machine so that a drop will be thrown on the back combination. I don't write this because you spoke of moisture and oil, but because I had the same trouble myself. I am using a carbon projector, which is simple. I punch a pin hole just above the condenser mount, and use a broken condenser which has cracked straight across. I lay this on top of the condenser-mount, in front of the pin hole, and if the machine is in line it will project an image of the carbon, upsidedown, on the upper magazine. The advantage is that the image is right before the operator's eyes, and he is looking at the front of the crater instead of the side. Some of us here in Bartlesville have been able to get better results from a Fort Wayne Compensarc than from a rectifier or a motor generator set. I sure want to get that new "Bible" when it comes out, and, while I think of it, just tell the operators to make better splices and the exchanges will not need to do so much inspecting.

It seems to me that while the projection of the carbon on the magazine is most excellent indeed, it would be better to look at the side than front of the crater, since its angle to the condensers would thus be better shown. If you got better results with alternating current than with D. C., then it must have been because you were using a rectifier and motor generator set of too small capacity, or else there was something wrong with the installation. I'll bet that "May" isn't a front name at all but has a "J. T." before it; probably my old college chump, J. T. May.

Traveling.

New York City sends in the following:

Have just returned from a trip through Canada, and of course while there employed a portion of my time in looking over the moving picture theaters. In general I found the business in a very healthy condition. Montreal has more moving picture theaters than ever. One peculiarity which attracted my attention in that city is that the majority of them are "scopes." There is the Nationalscope, Rochonoscope, Vitascope, Reidoscope, Omniscope, Bioscope and a lot more; but all these various "scopes" are playing to capacity. In Quebec, Three Rivers and Sherbrooke there was some good business being done. In St. Ann of Beaupre, where so many miracles happened, many speculators have opened moving picture theaters, but have been obliged to close them, for of the great number of people going there constantly none attend the theaters. They go there with one purpose in view, viz.: To pray and ask St. Ann for some favor. In Toronto, Hamilton, Kingston, St. Catherines and Niagara Falls, business is booming and projection is, on the average, high class. I also stopped at a small town in northern New York, Rouse's Point, a village of 1,800 and I found there a nice little theater seating 700, and putting up very good projection. People come in automobiles by the dozen. Mr. Wilfred Couture is owner, manager and operator. He cannot get a good film service. He has tried exchanges in Plattsburg, Albany, Ogdensburg and Boston. Has tried Independent and Licensed, and is paying more for junk film than we here are for high class service. I found this to be true in every small town I visited. The exchange men seem to think the small places don't understand the difference between good and bad films. The rule seems to be good service for large cities, and junk for the village. I personally inspected some of Mr. Couture's films as they came from the express office that evening, and their condition was an outrage.

I am indeed glad to receive a letter in such optimistic vein, always supposing the facts to justify the report, as I have no doubt they do. That capacity business sounds good, and trust the Canadian boys are putting up projection that will fully justify what has been said. As regards the junk-for-the-village proposition, it must be remembered that, as a general rule, very few of the small town managers are willing to pay the price for good service. It must also be taken into consideration that good service will cost a lot more money in a small town, than in a large city. In the city the films lose no time at all. For instance: a house in Brooklyn gets service from a 14th Street exchange in New York. The film goes out to the theater at noon, is used that afternoon and night, is returned that night, or the next morning, inspected, (?????), and at once goes out to a theater, perhaps up in the Bronx, so that there is no lost time at all. The small theater one hundred miles from New York also takes service. The exchange ships the film out and it loses one day on the road. The theater uses it one day and it loses another day coming back. If the place is not more than one hundred miles away, quite possibly there will only be a total loss of one day in transit, but that kind of business of course requires a very much larger investment on the part of the exchange. However, if a small town exhibitor wants good service and is willing to pay for it, understanding that the price will be proportionately high on account of the necessary lost time, then he ought to be able to get it, and I think he can. The whole thing sums up in this: Lost time on old films, for which there is not much demand, does not cut so large a figure; lost time on new films, which everybody wants, is expensive and there you are.

Light Trouble.

Silver City, Utah, comes in with the following:

Here is some more light trouble, and it seems that it is the greatest trouble in the projection of motion pictures. I am bothered with a weak light at times and have long tried to get at the root of the cause. I am getting current through a Fort Wayne Compensarc, 110 volts, 60 cycle a. c. Now I want to know if you could tell me the size condensers to use to get the best results. The machine is a Power's No. 5 and I have a 57-foot throw. I am using a No. 2 Bausch & Lomb lens but do not seem to get the sharpness of the pictures on the screen. At times there is a blue ghost in the center of the screen and when the lamphouse is back very far, the light then begins to weaken. I have to run on 40 amperes to get a strong enough light, at all. I would be pleased to read whatever you could advise in the next issue of The Moving Picture World. I always read everything in the Projection Department and, so far, have been benefited thereby.

Yes, Silver City, light trouble is naturally the biggest thing we have to deal with in projection, since that is the very foundation stone of the whole business. How many times have I got to tell you boys to give me the throw and the width of the picture when you want to know about lens size, or focal length. I presume I could dig up the information as to just what a Bausch & Lomb, No. 2 lens is by hunting through a stack of catalogs, but I haven't the time to do it. Give me the width of your picture and I will tell you what you ought to have, because having the width of the picture I can figure the focal length of your objective. Pulling the lamphouse back cannot make any difference in the amount of light you get, but it is possible to pull it back so far that the corners of your picture become dark, and while the same amount of light is going through, it is of inferior quality, due to the fact that the colored edge of the light, produced by chromatic aberration, is mixed with the white rays thus injuring the whole illumination. I would suggest that you get two 6½ and two 7½ condensers, and try (a) two 6½ (b) one 6½, one 7½, with the 7½ in front, and (c) two 7½, using the combination which gives the best results. You certainly will have to pull at least 40 amperes. You could not expect to get anything on less, using a. c. I would not consider the projecting of a 12-foot, or larger picture with less than 60 amperes of a. c. 40 amperes is a minimum, and I would not consider it as being enough a. c. for anything larger than a 10-foot picture.

Operator Visitor.

Mr. E. H. Spears, formerly Business Agent, Rochester Operators' Local Union No. 253, called on the editor last week. Brother Spears has taken a position as operator for the Eastman Kodak Company in an advertising road show they are putting out. He will travel extensively and is well pleased with his new position, in which we wish him every success.

Speed.

Missouri writes:

I have been a silent reader of the Department for a long time. Now I wish to ask a few questions concerning the Detroit Isolated Plant, 60 volts, 2 k.w. generator, and 3 h.p. engine. Do they give a good steady light? I own a good 3 h.p. Fairbanks-Morse engine. Could I buy the rest of the outfit and use the engine? I am using an Edison Exhibition Model machine and it has never given a bit of trouble. Could a screen be made by coating it with aluminum bronze?

I think, Speed, a moment's consideration would convince you I cannot offer advice of this kind, through the Department, concerning any specific kind of apparatus. I have some very good reports from the outfit in question; also I have some not so good. As a matter of fact, I think a good deal depends on the person who handles the outfit. I would suggest, however, that you write to the Detroit people direct, concerning these matters; also asking them whether you can buy a generator separate or not; I suppose you can. No, I would not coat my screen with aluminum if I were you. If done just right it makes a fairly good surface at first, but soon turns dark through oxidization. I cannot recommend it.

Corrections.

S. K. Leen, proprietor Rigby Theater, Madison, S. D., writes as follows:

I wish to correct a few slight errors made in the article I sent in, September 8th issue, concerning my isolated light plant. It should have been eight 15 watt tungstens, two 40 watt tungstens, one 1¾ h.p. motor for the machine; 76½-foot throw, whereas it was made to read eighteen 15 watt tungstens, twenty 48 tungstens, one ¾ h.p. motor, and 76-foot throw. No, friend R., I didn't make an error when I said "wired in a series, with 11 in the series." It is merely that you got the wrong understanding of it, which I note might easily be done from the way I wrote it. I meant the sixty-six 5 watt tungstens only are wired in series of 11. They are 10 volt lamps, so of course would have to be wired in series of 11 to take care of 110 volt pressure. I am glad you called myself, as well as Villisca's attention to the importance of giving the running expense of our isolated outfits per hour. We both neglected to do this, and according to Villisca's statement he certainly has me beat to a standstill on economy, for it takes one gallon of gasoline per hour to do my work and at the present writing I am paying fourteen cents per gallon. But even at that I am perfectly satisfied, since before I installed my plant, I paid the city thirty-two cents per hour for current. I should like very much to have Villisca state how much his running expense is per hour, for I am interested in his statement of economy—also, for information, would he state why he uses a 6 h.p. engine on a 2½ k.w. dynamo, and still claims more power for kerosene. I am running a 4 k.w. dynamo, with an overload, with my 6 h.p. Fairmont gas engine, and it makes no difference, full load, overload, or no load at all. It doesn't affect my engine in the least, for it keeps up the same steady speed. I note that Neighbor Villisca claims kerosene to be cleaner than gasoline. I have had no experience with kerosene, but don't see where it could be any cleaner than gasoline, since I have not cleaned my spark plug or spark plug chamber for the last two months. My spark plug chamber gives me no trouble whatever, and I have no oil cups to fill or watch that they drip eight drops per minute. The only oil cup I have is the one for each crank shaft bearing. These I fill with hard oil once a week. Those who have not tried it have no idea what satisfaction it is to own and operate one's own private light plant.

Many thanks, Brother Leen, for your excellent letter. If you can run your whole theater, projection light and all, for fourteen cents per hour, I don't think you have any kick in the matter of expense. That would be a dollar and forty cents for ten hours, and I note that you are pulling more than 4 k.w. We shall now expect to hear from friend Villisca, with a statement of his hourly expense, etc. Brother Leen wrote "hard oil." Presume he meant lard oil. The only hard oil I know of is a varnish.

Film Fault.

Durant, Okla., writes:

For the last month or so, I have noticed that the final few pictures of a great number of scenes would go out of focus, while the next scene would be all right. I have only seen this in the Nestor, and these clippings were cut from "The Little Moonshiner." We use thirty-day stuff.

The samples of film submitted show Durant's statement to be correct. The samples are from four to five pictures long, and while the first picture is sharp and clear, the others are more or less blurred. I shall send these samples to the Universal people, calling their attention to the matter, and it will no doubt be promptly remedied.

Isolated Plant.

The Electric Theater Company, Winfield, Iowa, writes as follows:

Like all the up-to-date theater managers and operators, we are constant readers of The World. The letters in the Projection Department concerning isolated light plants, have been of special interest, for the reason we ourselves own and operate what we consider the best plant in existence for this particular purpose. The entire outfit, consisting of engine, generator and switchboard with Weston instruments, was purchased from Fairbanks-Morse & Co., Chicago. The 10 h.p. Special Electric Gasoline Engine, with fly-wheel 5 feet 6 inches in diameter, a 5-inch face, speed 300 r.p.m., gives a power as steady as steam. The cooling system is a Forrester circulating pump pulling water from a well located about 25 feet from the pump. The water circulates through the engine and back through a return pipe to the well. This system eliminates all possibly danger of injury to the engine from freezing up, because when the engine is stopped the pump drains it automatically. The engine weighs about 6,000 pounds, and is set on a 15,000 pound concrete base. The generator is a direct current c.p. type, 7½ k.w., 115 volts (65 amperes). The pulley on generator is leather covered, 11¼ inches in diameter, belted to the engine fly-wheel by a 30-foot, two-ply endless leather belt, making the speed of generator 1,700, plus. The switchboard is equipped with voltmeter, ammeter, rheostat and two pilot lights. The entire outfit requires a floor space of about 15 feet long by 4 feet wide. Have operated this plant for one year, an average of two and a half to three hours per night, six nights in a week, with occasional mid-week matinees, and several Sunday religious services take place in the theater. In all that time there has been not one cent expended for repairs. I might add here that this was accomplished without any previous experience with electricity; though had some experience with gasoline engines. However, I claim that anybody with average intelligence could operate this plant successfully with but very little instruction. The satisfaction in operating and the results obtained cannot be overestimated. We project positively the plainest, steadiest and clearest picture possible. This is not only our opinion but the opinion of hundreds of strangers who have visited our little city. I honestly believe that in the year's time we have operated this plant, it has actually paid for itself in the way it has advertised our business. We use 35 amperes inside, burning six 40 watt tungstens, fourteen 25 watt tungstens, nine 4 c.p. incandescents, four 12-inch oscillating fans, two 12-inch stationary fans, one 18-inch exhaust fan and the arc through a grid type Edison rheostat, at the cost of approximately twenty-five cents per hour. Are running an airdome only now, with 22 amperes all told. Have run both theater and airdome at a cost not exceeding thirty-five cents per hour. Always operate at 115 volts, and there is scarcely any variation in pressure (not to exceed one volt) whether the amperage is increased or decreased. We are doing a good business, but whatever has been our success in the past, or may be in the future, is due to large extent to the satisfactory plant which produces the excellent light that projects the kind of pictures which make people talk. Our house is not large. It has a seating capacity of less than 200, but it is well ventilated, very attractive and has opera chairs on inclined floor. Might say in closing that our best advertisement is the people waiting outside to get in. If you think there is anything of interest or value in this letter, you are at liberty to publish any part of it or all of it. In closing we beg to remain yours for the uplift of the moving picture business in all its branches.

You certainly have a surplus of power in your engine, Winfield, since according to your statement you are only using about half of its capacity. I am a firm believer in a surplus of power in the engine and in the dynamo also; however, I should say this was more than is necessary. Your generator surplus is not so excessive—in fact, I would call the generator just about right for the work in hand, but unless you are projecting a very small picture, it seems to me you are not using enough current to get the best results. I have not figured out what all those motors will take, but do not think you can be using more than 25 amperes at the arc, which is hardly sufficient if your picture is more than 12 feet in width. However, you say you are getting the results, and that is what counts. The outfit is certainly a very complete one, but its first cost must have been pretty heavy. In looking through your letter again, I see I may be in error. You are probably using more current at the arc than I had supposed, because some of your incandescents would be switched off while the show is running. Moreover you do not say that the 35 amperes carries the whole business. We appreciate your kindness in sending in so complete a report, and trust that the S. R. O. sign will continue to be displayed at your house for a long time to come, but our advice would be for you to start thinking about building a larger house.

Voltage and Fuses.

New York City asks as follows:

(1) I pull 25 amperes d.c. through 30 ampere fuses from a d.c. 110 volt line. If I connect the same outfit on a 220 volt a.c. line would it cause the 30 ampere fuses to instantly blow when the switch is closed and the carbons brought together. I know the rheostat is liable to burn out bye and bye, but whether it would blow the fuses immediately or not puzzles me. (2) If the fire shutter is in good condition, the machine running at usual speed, film isn't broken, and the aperture clean of film scraps, could you think of anything else which will cause the film to catch fire from the arc? (3) Do they allow the use of cartridge fuses on a meter cutout? I know they are not allowed on operating room cut outs in New York City.

(1) Most certainly your knowledge of resistance is in urgent need of a new foundation and superstructure. It is so weak that it is in danger of total collapse. Certainly the fuses would blow, since the resistance of the rheostat, which would give you 25 amperes on 110 volts d.c. would give you about 90 on 220 a.c. while it lasted. The practical effect would be, however, to instantly blow the fuses, and if 90 ampere fuses were installed, then the rheostat coils or grids would become incandescent and burn off probably within one or two minutes. (2) Yes, should the sprocket holes be ripped out on both sides for a space of an inch or more, it might pass the upper sprocket and yet not pass the intermittent sprocket, thus causing the film to stop behind the gate, and, inasmuch as the upper sprocket would still be feeding, the film might bulge out over the top fire shield and down into the light, thus becoming ignited. This would not, however, be possible with all makes of machines. (3) Yes. The cartridge fuse is no longer allowed in New York operating room circuits, by reason of the fact that the boosting of these fuses is altogether too simple and handy an operation.

The West Replies.

One of the Western delegates to the I. A. T. S. E. convention writes as follows:

I note in The World of August 31st, a statement from Detroit presumably from some delegate to the convention that the Western delegates lent no assistance toward securing the financial assistance asked for by the Boston local and otherwise obstructed legislation beneficial to the operators. I can not remember this delegate having been on the floor of the convention in any cause, and fail to find his name in the proceedings in this manner although he is listed as being "also present" and as his statement is so much in error, I think he must have a bad case of grouch at something or other. Boston showed the delegates that they needed assistance and they certainly received the support of all operator delegates, their request being granted on the motion made by Dolliver of San Francisco 162, who is certainly a Western delegate. If Boston had any plans for the election of one or more grand officers they were careful to keep it to themselves, instead of offering it in the caucus held for this purpose where it surely would have been gladly received if it had any merit other than that of emanating from Boston. Now Boston having received the assistance asked for, and it having been repeatedly ruled that there shall be no distinction between operators' locals and stage hands' locals in any or all matters I fail to see why the operators' locals will not receive any just assistance due them, and I believe they will, as the increased per capita tax, so bitterly fought by many Eastern locals makes it possible for the International to give that assistance, and until I see some operators' local ask for deserved assistance and be refused I shall not change this belief.

I had fully expected that the Western men would be defended. The delegate, whose report was published, enjoys the confidence and esteem of the labor forces of the entire Pacific Coast. He is the official head, not only of a large operators' union, but also of one of the biggest organizations of theatrical employees on the entire Pacific Coast. I think the Toledo man misunderstood the delegate. There is a radical difference between the methods of the men of the East and the men of the West, and the man of the East is likely to believe his Western brother is a four-flusher because he goes about things in an energetic and above-board way; also there is more of a tendency on the part of the Western man to talk than we find in his Eastern brother. Should you meet a total stranger on the street of a Western city and speak to him, you would probably get a courteous, open-hearted response. Speak to a total stranger on the street in New York, and you will very likely get a grunt and a stare or the stare minus the grunt. Now, I don't mean this in any way a disparagement of the Eastern man. It is simply the result of his training. It is one of the differences between the East and the West. In the West, we are more apt to accept our brother man on his own say so. In the East we are more prone to put him down as, to say the very least, suspicious, until he is proven otherwise. As to the controversy over the convention doings, I was not there and therefore cannot comment intelligently. I had intended to attend the convention, but it was too far away. I am doubly sorry for this, in view of the fact that I am told that certain delegates censured me, and while I had able defenders, still I had rather have looked those traducers in the eye, telling them a few good hard truths with my own voice.

There still exist a few narrow-minded men who believe that the dissemination of knowledge is injurious to organized labor. How idiotic! One could scarcely believe such benighted ideas could exist in this enlightened age. These men, had they lived in the early days of trades unionism, would have been among those who strenuously fought and opposed the introduction of machinery, claiming that it would bring starvation to the laborer and utterly ruin the skilled crafts. Few know how fiercely the early trades unions fought the introduction of machinery; but machinery was introduced just the same, and instead of ruining the worker it helped him.

The union which cannot improve the financial and working conditions of its members without resorting to the suppression of knowledge is indeed a miserable failure, and has no right to exist at all. The editor of this Department was active in the labor movement before some of these wise men of the East who criticised him were born. He was in the trades union movement in the days when to be a trade unionist was a disgrace; when the agitator was a stench in the nostrils of mankind; when the labor advocate was regarded almost as a leper; when we won most of our strikes by physical force and violence, and he believes he knows about as much about the requirements of the labor movement and has perhaps done fully as much for that great movement as have some of his twenty-year-old detractors. But to the credit of the operators at large, and the organized operators in particular, these narrow-minded men are comparatively few in number, and are becoming fewer every year. They will soon, I believe, disappear altogether.

A Kick from Oklahoma.

Bartlesville, Okla., writes:

> What in the world is the matter with the Vitagraph? We have not had one in the last month but what jumped very badly. Also, why do some branches of the General Film Co. fail to send repairs which are ordered promptly, sometimes compelling one to wait as much as from three to five weeks, and often obliging one to re-order two or three times before the goods are finally received. And now I am going to make you jealous, friend Richardson. There is now, for the first time, a full grown operating room in this city. It is 10 x 14, with a 7½-foot ceiling, and only has one machine in it. The work bench is a 2 x 12, 13 feet long. There is a voltmeter and ammeter, city water and sink, outside window, etc. The tool kit consists of every tool named in the Handbook; besides which I have an assortment of drills from 3-64 to 13-64, by 64ths; also a screw plate from ⅛ to ¼ and another from 5-64 to 5-16 for machine screws. A neat tool cabinet is provided for keeping these in. The machine is an Edison—motor driven. All light circuits are controlled from the operating room, and an intercommunication system is arranged to the box office. I see several of the boys are sending in photos of their operating rooms, therefore thought I would show them that they're not so many after all. To again bring up a buried subject, here is some more dope on that fly-wheel-drive proposition. By actual test a weight of 264 lbs. did not spring the main spindle of an Edison machine enough to be able to detect it with a machinist's steel rule. This being the case, the weight of a belt weighing about ½ lb., and a one-pound tension weight certainly should not affect the intermittent movement in the least. I followed your directions in regard to "laying a ghost" and it helped greatly. I have been having trouble with condenser breakage lately. I was on the verge of giving up and asking you to help when I discovered a remedy. My prescription is: Drill a line of nine ⅛-inch holes in front of the lamphouse as near as possible to the condenser mount. This allows the hot air which gathers in the top part of the front of the lamphouse to escape. Also drill about five holes in the cone as near the condenser mount as possible. This causes a very much more free circulation of air in the cone. The point I make is this: There is practically no ventilation on either side of the condensers, except through the condenser mount between the lenses. The hot air rising creates a draught through the condenser mount between the lenses, but in the lamphouse there is no vent near the condensers, except directly under them, therefore inasmuch as the hot air will not go down and out through this vent, and there is no vent above the condensers, it stays there. In the cone the circulation is much better owing to the front end being open and to the opening for the slide carrier. This is the reason it is nearly always the rear condenser which breaks. The cold air is drawn up against one side of it while the other side has no ventilation, and this naturally causes uneven contraction and expansion which breaks the lens. The nine holes in the front of the lamphouse wall above the condenser allow the circulation of air on the other side of the lens and remedies this condition. I would like very much to have you express your opinion on this matter as it is a subject of much importance.

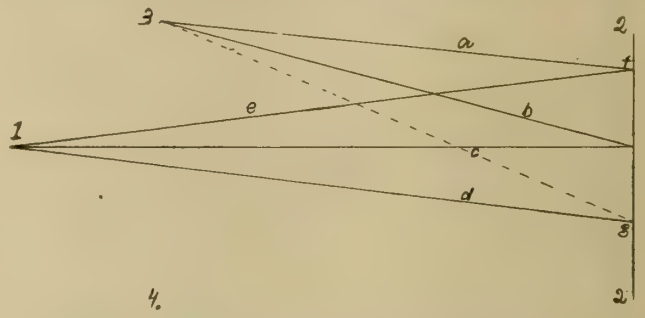
The film jump matter is respectfully referred to the Vitagraph Co., for investigation, and I am sure if any fault exists it will be remedied by that company as soon as it is brought to their attention. Very likely the exchange you deal with doesn't have the repairs you order in stock, and has to send for them. There is probably a delay of a day or two before they make the order, then the order has to go to New York or Chicago with a delay of anywhere from one day to a week there, and then two or three more days coming back. This would account for the whole matter, though it is only a guess on my part. The best way is for the exhibitor to carry in stock such spare parts as he is likely to use—that is to say, have extra parts on hand all the time. Allow me to compliment you on your operating room and its kit of tools. No, I am not jealous, but I am mightily pleased to have such reports as this. As to the fly-wheel shaft, it is not a question of springing the shaft at all. It is a question of excessive wear on the bearing. I thought I made that matter perfectly clear. Glad to know the ghost laying instructions have helped you. As to the condenser matter, I don't quite "get cha Steve." You say the hot air, not having any way of escaping, must remain in the lamphouse. My dear sir, what in Sam Hill are the vent openings at the top of the lamphouse for anyhow? I was under the impression they were to allow the escape of hot air, and I have repeatedly cautioned the operators to keep the top vent holes and screen perfectly clean and open, so as to allow free circulation. Possibly the holes you speak of will help. I don't dispute that proposition, though I very much doubt if drilling holes in the cone would have any practical effect, since there is a big opening there anyhow, both at the outer end and around the slide carrier. We thank you for submitting your solution of the matter, and repeat that the holes in the lamphouse wall may be of a great deal of value. Reports seem to indicate this.

An Optical Problem.

Pennsylvania writes:

> Am having a bunch of trouble and, as an interested reader of the department, think you can probably help me. In the first place, I am troubled with a blue center in my picture. Am using Power's Five, projecting a 13-foot picture at 88 feet; 6-inch e. f. lens with a 6-inch back and a 7½-inch front condensing lens. What would you suggest? But here is the great puzzle, and if you can solve it, you are the first one whom I have ever met who would even give a guess. Am a member of Auxiliary Local 37, of Philadelphia, and have asked all the boys in the Union, but they cannot help me. We are using a large glass screen, the same being two store windows covered with aluminum. When you sit on the right side of the house, the right side of the picture is very bright, but the left side dark. At times you can hardly see the picture on that half. When you reverse your position in the house and sit on the left side, the effect is reversed, but when you sit in the center the picture is very bright all over. Now, Brother Richardson, I trust you can help me in this, as my employer and I are floored, and it is the only thing against our show, as we are running the steadiest, brightest picture in town.

I would suggest the substitution of two 7½-inch condensers, instead of one 6-inch and one 7½-inch, and the pulling back of your lamphouse as far as it will go. As to the screen I can only offer my own theory in the matter, but I believe the theory is correct.



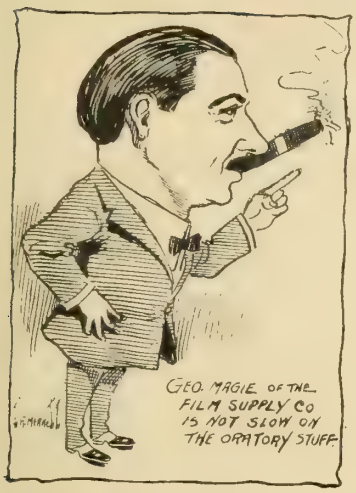
In the sketch 1 represents the lens, 2-2 the screen, 3 the eye of a person seated at the left of the screen. We are supposed to be above looking down on the floor of the house. Ray C is a light ray coming straight from the lens to the center of the screen. You must clearly understand that a picture is seen wholly and entirely by reflected light, and that in light reflection the angle of incidence must always be equal to the angle of reflection. That is to say, a line drawn from the screen to a point half way between 2 and 3 would represent the basic line and the angle between that line and lines A and E would be equal. Now, it is a somewhat difficult proposition to make you understand what I am driving at, but in the first place you must remember that you have a perfectly or practically a perfectly smooth surface on your screen, so that there will be little or no diffusion of the light. Now glancing at rays A and E, you will readily see, I think, that there would be a great deal more reflection from point F reaching the eye of a person seated at 3, than there would be from point G. I don't know as I can explain this, unless you can understand it from the diagram, but, the surface being perfectly smooth, the angle of ray D would be towards 4, and the only light from such a ray, which could reach the eye of a person at 3 would be that due to roughness in the surface of the screen. Now, the cloth screen is quite rough and the surface presents almost every angle so that 3 would see just as much light from G, as 4 would, but with a perfectly smooth surface, the proposition is changed. I think there lies your whole trouble.

I would like to ask Brother Rembusch, President of the Mirror Screen Co., to say whether I am or am not correct in this theory. It is one which I have evolved myself in reply to this question, and I may be wrong. Let us hear from you Neighbor Rembusch, if you please.

NEW FILM MANUFACTURER.

Sidney Franklin, the well-known comedy scenario writer and producer is now with the Arrow Motion Picture Company. This company intends releasing one genuine farce comedy every Tuesday and expects to help meet the increasing demand for good, clean comedy. Exhibitors all over the country are crying for better comedy and more of it, and all the film manufacturers who produce really good comedies find a steadily increasing demand.

Flickers.



George A. Magie.

IT is worth your while to know the subject of this thumb-nail sketch if you are in the film game. A genial, easy-going, always the same sort of fellow is George Magie. Nothing spectacular about him, you know; just an every-day business man—one of the few who, by some chance, got into the business of promoting pictures. If you are looking for George you will most likely find him at the offices of the Film Supply Company, the equipment of which is due to his good taste; but he is, strictly speaking, the business end of the Solax Company, the product of which he has placed before the public in a most favorable light. I am of a mind to say many pleasant words for George, whom I esteem as a friend, did the occasion require, but those of you who meet him will realize, upon first acquaintance, that he needs no sponsor. George really looks what he is—a gentleman and a level-headed business man.

J. Parker Reid, of the Garden of Allah Film Company, 145 West 45th Street, has contracted with two large European manufacturers of feature films for the entire output of their plants. These films will be released through the American market.

MAC.

Screen Club a Winner.

Rapidly Increasing Membership of Prominent Motion Picture Men Seems to Indicate the Fulfillment of a Long-Felt Want in Filmdom.

THE fourth meeting of the Screen Club was held Saturday evening, September 14, at Bryant Hall, Sixth Avenue near 42nd Street, New York, Mr. King Baggot presiding. The presence of many new faces, most of them prominent in the motion picture industry, seems to make it certain that the Screen Club is going to be one of the most active and prosperous of the theatrical clubs in New York. There is every indication at the outset that the organization will fill a long-felt want. The ready response of so many men who stand high in their profession is evidence enough of the fact that there is a fraternal spirit in the business. Many of the men assembled there had heard of each other by reputation, but the opportunity of a meeting had never presented itself.

There have been few clubs formed with better prospects of a healthy financial condition. Money was immediately forthcoming from the assemblage without the slightest suggestion of hesitancy. There was almost a scramble among the men to get their money in the cash register and their names in the book as charter members. At the close of the fourth meeting the temporary treasurer reported that the paid membership amounted to 101, and with $5 from each member the treasury stood $505 to the good, minus incidental expenses of about $35.

One of the most encouraging aspects of the Screen Club is the general desire for the uplift of the business. This sentiment is very strong and most of the members seem to feel in honor bound to work for the elimination of existing evils and for the raising of the industry to the highest status of respectability and dignity. In his address at the third meeting, Mr. Harry Raver, manager of the Film Supply Company, voiced the sentiments of all when he stated his views that that club should be absolutely non-partisan. It has been quite definitely understood all around that all barriers dividing the licensed and independent factions shall not exist insofar as the organization is concerned.

Mr. Bunny was the principal speaker at the last meeting. As chairman of the membership committee he reported progress, and then gave the members some fatherly advice. He warned them particularly against the practice of electioneering, defining what he meant as the action some company might make in touting one of its members for executive office for the sake of what publicity might be gained from such an election. He brought up the question of the "black-ball," defining it as both a great menace and a great safeguard. Rightly used he recognized in it a means of keeping the organization pure and confined to high minded men who had the best interests of the business at heart. Wrongfully used he described it as an institution of injustice that might be invoked for the satisfaction of personal animosities or for a dozen other motives. Mr. Bunny used this warning to bring home the importance of the fact that the selection of officers should not be hasty and that every precaution should be taken to elect to office men of unquestioned integrity and highest character; men who could not, in their very natures, stoop to any abuse of the power of the black-ball.

Mr. Bunny gave evidence of his strong enthusiasm for the club, pledging his time, his effort and some of his money to further its interests. He is one of the most ardent of picture fans and his greatest desire is to bring about the ranking of the motion picture business as one of the fine arts.

There were also brief addresses by Mr. James Kirkwood, Tony O'Sullivan, Oscar E. Appel, George Nicholls, Billy Quirk, H. Z. Levine and Jack Goodwin. The sentiments of these gentlemen were enthusiastically in favor of organization with the highest of aims and motives. In fact, the sentiments of the entire gathering were along these lines. One praiseworthy aspect of the organization is a determination of the members to keep the club truly representative of the motion picture industry, and to rigidly exclude the button-hole makers, haberdashery salesmen and their ilk, for all time.

The meeting adjourned until Thursday evening, September 19, at 8.30 p. m., the meeting to be held at the same hall.

TOM NASH TO MANAGE SELIG'S WESTERN PLANT.

Mr. Tom Nash, for several years superintendent of the Selig Polyscope Company, with headquarters at Chicago, has been appointed general manager of the Selig Western studios. Mr. Nash has been connected with the Selig company for the past fourteen years and is recognized as one of the most capable men in the motion picture business.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER" (Essanay).

This is a remarkable and extraordinary dramatic subject, unusual in portrayal and scenic beauty, from the Essanay Eastern Stock Company, and features Martha Russell and Francis X. Bushman in feature roles. For absolute novelty of plot this production has never been surpassed.

While walking along the rocky shore with his pretty sweetheart, Charles Fleming, an artist, hears a weird, strange musical sound coming from the water below, and pauses to listen. His sweetheart's scarf now blows away, and he clambers down to get it. Frightened by his approach Undine, a beautful mermaid, who has been sunning herself on the rocks, slips out of sight into the waves, but not before Fleming catches sight of her and follows her course through the water with astonishment and admiration. Determined to meet her he returns the next morning and finds her on the rocks. Wooing her with all the fire of his passionate soul he secures her promise to assume a mortal form and wed him. Father Neptune is now summoned from the deep, but warns Undine that if she assumes mortal form she can return to the sea no more. At dawn the artist returns and finds her waiting for him as a beautiful young girl. After the marriage the honeymoon in the cottage by the sea begins, but Fleming soon tires of her eccentricities and longs for his old sweetheart. One morning, in a fit of passion, he leaves her. Broken-hearted, Undine calls on Father Neptune to take her back into the bosom of the deep. Next morning the artist, regretting his desertion of the beautiful mermaid, is hastening along the shore when he comes upon her dead body cast up by the waves of which she is no longer a part. In a wild burst of grief he sinks down beside her, then slowly the scene fades and Fleming sits up with a start as he realizes it has all been a dream.

It will at once be seen that the production is extraordinary, both in point of production, plot and portrayal. The marine scenes were taken at Devil's Island in Lake Superior, during the recent trip of the Essanay players to Bayfield, Wis., and are exquisite for their rugged beauty and grandeur.

Martha Russell gives a striking portrayal of Undine, the "mermaid," a most difficult and exhausting characterization; Francis X. Bushman is vital and gripping as Fleming, the artist; Harry Cashman renders a splendid character of Father Neptune; Ruth Stonehouse is prettily cast as the sweetheart, and Wm. Walters plays Father McCabe, the priest. The production was released September 17th.

"THE MUSKETEER'S CONSCIENCE" (C. G. P. C.).

This play is perhaps not so remarkable for plot as it is for its very fine acting. The parts are difficult to carry off well, and that they are very striking is to the credit of the cast selected. Beautiful old-time scenery harmonizes with the silk and velvet of ladies and musketeers, and throughout the play the effects are bold and broad.

A French nobleman is in love with a Vampire, who asks him to secure for her a magnificent necklace, the property of a Countess. The noble, financially ruined, is unable to purchase the jewelry, and, consequently, stoops to robbery. In the dead of the night he enters the chateau and has secured the necklace when his presence is discovered by the Countess. She moves as if to warn the servants and the musketeer, losing his self-control, suddenly seizes and strangles her.

Scene from "The Musketeer's Conscience" (C. G. P. C.).

The deed once committed, self-preservation and oblivion are the two things his thoughts claim. But oblivion is impossible for, wherever he turns, he imagines he is pursued by the dead woman, holding out the necklace to him. Fleeing from the apparition, he suddenly topples out of one of the windows behind him.

He is found by the woman for whom he has cast away his honor and life, and by her orders is carried within; she bends over him to attend him, but even as she does this she catches sight of the necklace he has stolen, and with a little cry of joy she snatches it away. Turning to the mirror she adorns herself with it and admires her reflection in the glass, whilst her lover, after struggling before her to gain one last look or word of thanks, passes away realizing the futility of his love and sacrifice. It will be released September 27th.

"A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE" (Eclair).

Wild animals in a picture can generally be counted upon to furnish the audience with a thrill, and this well done Eclair comedy is no exception. A couple of handsome young lions are used in the picture and the situations created by their presence in a well-regulated household provide the comedy and the thrills. It is one of those daring motion picture exploits that will make any audience, no matter how jaded, sit up and pay attention.

As the story runs: A beautiful young American heiress sojourning in Europe is overcome with ennui. The world and its pleasures seem to have lost their power to furnish her with any new sensations or even to keep her blood circulating in the proper way. She finally inserts an advertisement in a daily paper to the effect that she is an heiress and is willing to take as a husband any desirable man who can thrill her with any great emotion which she has not experienced before. The paper is read by a little sawed-off half-portion of a man. The effect of the advertisement upon him is a thrill that he himself has never before experienced, for he sees in it an opening to make his everlasting fortune. He does not know just exactly how he will furnish the thrill, but being a fellow who has always lived by his wits, he knows he will produce it somehow, even if he has to dynamite the house.

Scene from "A Marriage of Convenience" (Eclair).

There are, of course, other applicants, and when he arrives at the young lady's dwelling he finds there two previous callers, both of them long of body and short of wit. In the matter of size they have him looking like a shrimp, and as for manners, the two elongated specimens shunt him back into the boor class from his very entrance. However, Mr. Pee-Wee is a determined little fellow, who has evidently been coping with tall men all his life.

While rambling around and racking his brain for an idea, he comes to the menagerie in a park. As he pauses before a cage of lions, an idea comes to him instantly. He bribes the keeper to loan him two of the lions and, somehow or other, he manages to get them to the young lady's house. He turns them loose in the hallway and then runs through the house alarming the occupants. The lions come rushing on through the various rooms after the flying occupants, both of the tall suitors being well in advance of the fugitive party. The little comedian brings up in the rear and with a whip beats off the lions when they get too close to the heiress, who is nearly dead with fright. Finally, when all but the heiress have made their escape from the house, little Pee-Wee walks over to the lions and strokes them as though they were pet dogs. He quiets the fears of the heiress and induces her to fondle one of the lions. She is quite pleased with this new sensation, and the bravery of her half-sized suitor makes such an impression upon her that she accepts him forthwith.

As will be supposed from the foregoing description, the comedy is full of life and sensation. The lions are very beautiful specimens and are more than pleasing to look at. They do not appear to be worked by a professional animal man, but the entire cast of the comedy appears in the scene with them. Of course, they are tame, but not too tame to make such a picture a pleasant undertaking. The actors play their parts with extreme unction under the circumstances, and do not at any time, except when the story calls for it, give any visible evidence of fear. It ought to be a big winner and one that will send the audience out talking.

"ROSE OF THE ISLANDS" (Champion).

"Rose of the Islands," a Champion release for September 23, is a very romantic picture of fisherfolk set in typical backgrounds that give us glimpses of lowly homes on the beach and of salty waves. It tells a story of love's self-sacrifice and final vindication.

As the first act opens, we see the charming heroine, a fisherman's pretty daughter, busy mending a net. It is she who is the Rose of the Islands. Her name is Rose and her beauty has marked her out from the other girls of the village. She has two lovers who quickly appear. She prefers Jean; but Peter is soon shown to be the more worthy of the two. Jean is a gambler and this weakness leads him to other vices until we see in him a thief.

Scene from "Rose of the Islands" (Champion).

The second act is largely set in an interior, the hut of Rose's old father from whose little hoard Peter has found Jean stealing. At this point the two men hear Rose coming. Peter, to save her the pain of knowing Jean a thief, hides him; but the entrance of the old father brings about the discovery of the culprit in his hiding place. Peter now has to accuse Jean or take the blame himself, for that the crime has been committed is all too plain. Jean points at Peter, who admits being the thief.

The third act shows the result of this. Peter is in trouble. Rose suspects the truth, refuses to marry Jean and ends by stowing herself away in Peter's boat. She knows that he is preparing to leave the island for good. The last scene shows them sailing away together, very happy.

John Cort, widely known as a promoter of legitimate theatrical enterprises, is now president of the Cort-Kitsee Company, formed to exploit the invention of Dr. Isadore Kitsee known as the Chrono-Kinetograph. Dr. Kitsee made his first attempt to master a device for the development of speaking-moving pictures in the year 1905. In his laboratories in Philadelphia he first produced films in which, through a chemical process, the exact spacing was attained. Later on he used electromagnetic means for this purpose evolving his present device, which may be applied to any of the existing types of projecting machines, synchronizing the same with any existing types of phonograph machines; in other words, given a picture house already equipped with a projecting machine Dr. Kitsee is said to be able to synchronize the same with a phonograph of any type desired, either of his own invention or any of the machines already on the market.

A demonstration of Dr. Kitsee's device was given on Sept. 16 in St. Timothy Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

"THE WINNER AND THE SPOILS" (Majestic).

As a costume play, "The Winner and the Spoils" is one of the handsomest pictures that has been done by Majestic in a long time. The story is laid in France, during the seventeenth century. The costumes are in correct accordance with the period and the story itself reminds one of Stanley Weyman's stories, such as "Under the Red Robe" or "A Gentleman of France." As may be expected there are sword passages and more or less swashbucking as the story unfolds. This production is the work of Mr. Oscar E. Apfel and reflects much credit upon him.

Like many of the French romantic stories, this one hinges upon a game of cards. The young scion of an aristocratic family has plunged himself deeply into debt to a Marquis, who is an expert at cards and more or less a professional. He fleeces the young man regularly until the youth is reduced to absolute penury. The victim's last resort is to get possession of his family's jewels. His sister, however, learns that he is desperate for money and surmises that he will try to steal the jewels. Her warning fears are fulfilled as she goes to the secret hiding place and finds that he has been there first and taken the family heirlooms, to stake at the gambling table. The girl determines that she will save the family treasure by disguising herself as a boy and making her entrance into the gambling room of the tavern. She effects an entrance but is quickly recognized by her brother and the crafty Marquis. In spite of her presence the crafty Marquis wins the jewels from the lad and it is then that his sister openly denounces the Marquis as a thief.

Scene from "The Winner and the Spoils" (Majestic).

The Marquis, of course, according to the custom of the time, promptly challenges the disguised girl to a duel, and she accepts the challenge on condition that the winner of the duel shall be the possessor of the jewels. This is signed and agreed to, and all parties repair to the grove, the disguised girl trembling in her boots at the prospect of being impaled upon a sword. However, she proves to be a vixenish little creature, and disregards all the polite rules of duelling by using her sword with both hands and lunging fearlessly at the Marquis. During a moment's truce she takes full advantage of the Marquis off his guard and stabs him without the least compunction. The Marquis is unable to continue the duel, therefore the girl is the winner.

Next day the wounded Marquis appears at the ancestral halls of the young lady's family, there to fulfill his pledge of delivering the spoils to the winner, and he turns over the family jewels to her. At the same time he brings a commission from the army, sending the girl's spendthrift brother to an army position in Africa. By bringing back the jewels as promised, the gambling Marquis arouses a certain latent admiration on the part of the young woman who defeated him. The closing of the story indicates that a love affair between the two is well under way.

As a costume play it is surely well done, both from a standpoint of scenery and costumes, and is well acted besides. Miss Mabel Trunnelle appears as the soldier's sister and Herbert Prior is seen in the part of the gambling Marquis.

TO PRODUCE WELL-KNOWN FICTION SERIES.

The Bradley Film Manufacturing Company beginning at an early date will produce the well known "Jimmy Flynn" short stories. Some of the best juvenile players around these parts have already been gathered for this intent, and as some of the characters in them are typical, it will provide the youngsters excellent opportunity to prove their worth. Among a few of the first to be released may be mentioned, "Bull-Dogs and Automobiles," "An Unexpected Venture," "The Eternal Triangle," "Bullhead's Waterloo," and "A Rainy Day Affair."

N. Y. WORLD INTERVIEWS JAP ACTRESS.

Her name is Taku Takagi and she plays the female lead in the Thanhouser series of Japanese plays that begins with the release of "Birth of the Lotus Blossom," Friday, Sept. 13. She is a real Japanese, and the other day "Our Japanese Reporter" of the New York World went to New Rochelle and interviewed her on picture acting as it appealed to her Japanese temperament. And here's how, according to the printed story:

"Acting for moving pictures is such a fun, but it isn't as easy as it looks. The hardest part is they want me to play an Americanized Japanese. They want me to play just like a Japanese girl the American imagines. Lots of actresses who never saw Japan played the Japanese girl parts, and they want me to act just like those American actresses did."

It will be noticed that the newspaper printed Miss Takagi's remarks apparently as they came from her, not in a perfect English but in the simple, picturesque wording of the Oriental translator. Continuing on her New Rochelle experience, Miss Takagi said, regretfully:

Miss Taku Takagi.

"When I am trying to act naturally, then somebody says. 'Cut it out, you don't look like a Japanese.' But I don't know how the Americans want a Japanese girl to act. I am a Japanese and am trying to act naturally, as I did in Japan. But they don't want that."

The "Japanese Reporter" asked her if she "wishes to be a moving picture actress all the time," and she said:

"Oh, no! It's fun and I like it. But I don't want to keep it up. I want to act on stage. But not yet; I am now studying the American dancing and singing."

The Jap reporter next queried on "which she liked better, the Japanese way of acting or the American way of acting." The interviewed replied:

"I think the American way is better, because it is so natural. The old acting of Japan is so formal, though there are many things that are beautiful and good."

Thanhouser Company launched the Japanese series, in which Miss Takagi is featured at the head of a company of Jap players, on learning that Jap plays will be in vogue on Broadway this season, three prominent theaters opening with productions of that nature.

"A SISTER'S DEVOTION" (American).

The American offers a Western subject under the title of "A Sister's Devotion," which possesses the elements that should please most patrons of the photoplay. The first scene opens in a modest home in the East, where Paul Trainor is preparing for his departure for the West. Paul and his sister Bess are orphans. Paul is like most boys—rather wayward and improvident, but his sister has a woman's saving qualities and has laid by a nice little sum for a rainy day. By this means she is able to provide her brother with sufficient money for his venture and he fares forth to establish himself in a new country.

Scene from "A Sister's Devotion" (American).

Paul arrives at his destination—a Western mining camp, and falls in with gamblers who soon relieve him of the money his sister gave him. The hotel keeper, who learns of the young man's circumstances, writes his sister a warning letter which determines her to go to his rescue. She falls in with kindly disposed people who give her every possible service. Paul has not yet broken away from his evil companions and is still dallying with the cards.

Scene from "A Sister's Devotion" (American).

In a game in which it appears as though luck has changed and he is about to recoup himself for his numerous losses he detects a fraud which, if successful, would have caused him to lose. There are two shots. Paul leaps through the window and is a fugitive from justice. He rushes to his sister for aid, quick as a flash she determines on a course of action and, disguised in her brother's clothes, is off on horseback. Paul and a friend start in another direction. The sheriff's posse are off in pursuit of their quarry. The pursued takes refuge in a mine, leaves a note at the mouth that the first man entering will be shot.

The posse keep a guard at the mine and early the next morning enter only to find they have been deceived. This ruse gains time for Paul and he succeeds in crossing the State line. At the coroner's inquest it develops that Paul shot in self-defense and is exonerated. The news is carried to Paul by Bess and a joyful reunion is held. Paul's friend and Bess have developed mutual admiration for each other and the story closes with a beautiful tableau of Bess and her lover.

The action is good, photography is also good and the settings are in keeping. Altogether this makes a very good and delightfully pleasing story.

Announcement is made by H. A. Spanuth, president of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, that exclusive right to make a picture covering the whirlwind trip of Colonel Roosevelt over the United States, has been secured by his company from the National Progressive Party and Colonel Roosevelt personally. Through this arrangement it has been possible to place a camera man on the car with the Roosevelt party.

MR. H. A. SPANUTH,
President of the General Publicity and Sales Co.

The film is not to be political in character or uses, but is to show the greatest and most conspicuous American of today to the people as a man, and to allow the people in the towns which are unfortunate enough not to be able to see him, to get as near a life-like presentation of the Colonel as it is possible to give.

Besides the film will be shown photographs of the great men with whom he has come in contact in the different States and his associations with the cowboys and the Indians and as an engine-driver while his train crossed the Great Divide.

By an additional piece of good fortune, Mr. Spanuth was able to get the royal moving picture photographs of the German Emperor escorting Mrs. Roosevelt and Colonel Roosevelt escorting the Empress through the cheering crowds in Berlin. The importance of this film will be understood when it is taken into consideration that none of the pictures of the German Emperor are allowed to be released without his consent and that it was the German Emperor's friendship for our ex-President that got for the General Film Publicity & Sales Company this concession.

UNIVERSAL'S NEW QUARTERS.

Increase in Volume of Business Necessitates Larger Accommodations.

When the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. was formally organized it found very convenient and comfortable quarters at 1 Union Square, New York. At first, five offices were sufficient to meet the requirements of the big executive and clerical force, but as the business became systematized, and the volume of business done became greater new rooms were added until they occupied nine large offices on the seventh floor of that building.

View of Mecca Building, Broadway and 48th Street.

With the addition of several new brands and the acquisition of the output of several foreign manufacturers, including the Ambrosio, the Great Northern Features, Milano, etc., even the great amount of floor space occupied was not sufficient to accommodate the large working force required and other quarters had to be secured.

The new quarters will be in the Mecca Building, an imposing structure at 48th St. and Broadway. The entire third floor has been leased and when the necessary alterations are completed the Universal will have the largest and most thoroughly equipped executive offices of any film manufacturing company in the world.

The various departments will be arranged so as to facilitate the operations of each with the other. Special offices will be maintained for the accounting, scenario, advertising, publicity, stenographic, clerical, poster, photograph and other departments.

PROMINENT EXCHANGE MEN VISIT AMERICAN PLANT.

Last week Mr. E. Mandlebaum of the Lake Shore Film Supply Co., Cleveland, Ohio, Mr. Phil Gleichman of the Mutual Film Corporation, Detroit, Mich., and Mr. Fred C. Amer, of the Buckeye Lake Shore Film Co., Columbus, Ohio, visited Chicago and made a trip out to the Flying "A" plant. After a careful inspection of the studio and laboratories they witnessed a private exhibition of a few advance releases, concerning which they expressed themselves very favorably.

THANHOUSER OUTING.

Employees of the New Rochelle Studio and Factory, With Their Friends, at City Island.

Two hundred members and friends of the Thanhouser Company's force went to the Bay View Hotel, City Island, on Saturday, September 7, for the first annual outing. Athletic events took place and the winners follow:

Men's bowling—Won by John Wallace; ladies' bowling won by Anna Drew.

Men's 20-yard dash—Won by Carl Leviness; ladies' 20-yard dash, won by Blanche Bugle.

Men's potato race—Won by John Gleason; ladies' potato race, won by Edith Houser.

Dancing price—Won by Mrs. Hattie McCroskery and Theodore Heise.

Fat ladies' race—Won by Mrs. Harry Benham, with Tilly Specht second.

The committee in charge was composed of Bertram Adler, Charles Gercke and Charles Van Houten.

The judges of the events were Frank Zimmerman and John Andren.

One thing the party did not appreciate. The large motor "bus," used to convey them home, was heavily loaded, necessitating unloading at the foot of every hill. Many of the men who were compelled to walk had to help the progress of the "bus" by pushing it. Their remarks are not printed.

Others who went included Jessie B. Bishop, Teresa Burke, Adele Jordan, Francis Lyons, Frank Capparelli, Mrs. G. J. Badgely and daughter Helen, Mrs. Mike McCurran, James Booker, Mrs. Theodore Heise, Andrew Harte, Mrs. Charles Gercke, J. Chesterman.

Walter Foy, Leon Allen, John Burke, John Desmond, Frank Stroh, George Kraft, Cyril Connelly, Ernest Marx, Mrs. F. L. Zimmerman, John Jackowitz, Ernest Haller, Lawrence Fowler, Irene Christie, Lawrence Williams, Mrs. C. J Van Houten, Nora Riley, Nettie Stamp, Elizabeth Edwards, Mabel Zimmerman, Francis Newburg, Mrs. L. J. Henderson, Frank Grimmer, William Garwood, Harry Benham, Marie Eline and mother, Mignon Anderson and mother, A. A. Cadwell.

C. L. Gregory, William Zollinger, Fanna Gregory, Harry Spear, C. Dull, Robert Newman, Elizabeth Webber, H. A. Markes, C. Carey, F. Champury, Lewis Thomas, John Miller, James Wallace, Frank Urson, Perry Harton, Phil Brady, Dave Thompson, Jeanette Henry, Anna Drew, Rose Scott, Lila Chester and Mrs. John Henderson.

Pathe Freres have it, the one big film of the year. With Sagamore Hill as a background, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, the most talked of man in the United States, was the target for a Pathe Freres camera for an entire day. Everybody's curiosity is aroused when the name of the illustrious Colonel is mentioned. Think, Mr. Exhibitor, of the crowd you will draw when you announce at your theater. "Colonel Roosevelt will positively appear." The film can be had at your exchange on October 3rd.

There are many pictures of Mr. Roosevelt making addresses, but they do not compare with a film showing him following his natural bent—the unconventional, and proving himself capable, if necessary, of doing well any work his hands find to do.

The apostle of the strenuous life went through the day's routine, and nothing he did escaped the eye of the camera. The picture gives one an intimate insight into the habits of a man full of vitality, a man who loves the open country, and who, although perhaps the busiest in the land, still finds time to exercise sufficiently to keep himself in superb physical condition. Members of the Roosevelt family are introduced in the course of the film's run.

After the film was printed, Colonel Roosevelt called at Pathe Freres' office and viewed it on the screen. When the last foot of film was reeled off, his comment was: "Bully," and he gave them his permission to use it. Don't forget the release date, October 3rd.

NEW THEATER SYNDICATE ORGANIZED.

The Standard Motion Picture Theater Company of America is the name of a new company organized to purchase and operate motion picture theaters. It is capitalized for $300,000. The company owns and operates four theaters at the present time. The incorporators named are Elliot R. Couden, cashier of the Ridgewood National Bank; John C. Maracle, E. C. Davis, Maurice Davidson, W. P. Eisenhardt, general manager of the American M. P. Machine Co.; Albert B. Norwalk, and Sidney Ascher, a New York exhibitor.

"THE PRINCESS AND THE MERCHANT" (C. G. P. C.).

This is a delightful piece of work, worthy of the best traditions of our popular films. It has all the atmosphere of the east and tells the story of Princess Ourida, who fell in love with Abdullah, a young merchant in the bazaar to which she daily made visits. The preference shown by her to Abdullah, who on his part was by no means indifferent to charms, excited the hate and anger of Mohammed, his neighbor.

The Princess somewhat indiscreetly sent a note to Abdullah telling him that she wished to see him at eventide. This note was intercepted by Mohammed, who, cleverly sending his rival astray, kept the appointment himself. His sudden appearance sent the Princess into a dead faint, and, thinking her to be dead, Mohammed, quaking with fear, stuffed her limp body into a big chest which he dragged into the forest. On the way he was seen by Abdullah, who, as he had sold it to the Princess, immediately recognized the chest. He followed Mohammed, saw him commence to dig a grave in the forest, and also the lid of the chest suddenly open as the Princess, recovering from her faint, endeavored to emerge. He hastened to her assistance, was worsted in a struggle with Mohammed and lost consciousness himself. Mohammed, however, suddenly fell dead through a seizure, and Abdullah on recovering, had the happiness of learning that his pretty customer was a princess and that, with his rival out of the way, his chief business was to marry her. This film, handsomely colored, will be released September 24th.

Scene from "The Princess and the Merchant" (C. G. P. C.).

Herbert Schulenberg, of New Bremen, Ohio, writes that he has let the contract for the erection of a moving picture house, 32 x 65 feet, to be completed on December 15. The new house will be devoted exclusively to moving pictures. Cade Schulenberg, son of the proprietor, will be the operator.

"THE LUCK LOSER" (Eclair).

"The Luck Loser" is one of those free, easy-swinging comedies on love and frivolity. It deals with the flirtations of a young lady intent on leading the young fellows to propose, and then joyfully turning them down, that she may gloat and boast over the hearts she has broken. But when Mama gets wise to the situation, daughter is told to make a choice among three young eligibles, or beget herself back to boarding school. Daughter having neither taste nor desire for convent school life, if of course forced to the other alternative of marriage, but whom to choose is her perplexing question.

Scene from "The Luck Loser" (Eclair).

So she plans to have the thre young men race to New Rochelle, where the winner is to find the wife-to-be awaiting his victorious arrival.

The one fellow she loved best down in her heart of hearts is tricked by the other two, and left injured by the roadside. He wires the girl, who rushes to his side and promises him her hand. Then she hurries back to meet the victor of the race. When he arrives she brings forth a colored maid, for she had merely promised the winner he would find a wife. It was her good fortune not to have said in implicit fashion, that she was to be the wife-to-be.

She was just a quick-witted girl who could take advantage of technicality.

BRADLEY TO HAVE CONCERN BEACON.

The latest addition to the newly-organized Bradley concern is a weekly publication entitled "Production Facts." It will be edited by Will K. Bradley, and will be illustrated profusely throughout, exploiting full data on all Bradley productions. It will be out in a few weeks, and a copy will be sent to each independent exhibitor for the asking.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND.

THE Acme Amusement Company of Kennebunk, Me., state right owners of "Zigomar," the censored feature picture, report excellent returns from their investment. The Acme Amusement folks showed the writer testimonial letters from F. X. C. Cote, manager of Cote's Theater, Biddeford, Me., and from Thomas H. Cuddy, manager of the Augusta, Me., Opera House, stating that the feature was the greatest drawing card we have ever booked," etc.

Word comes to the writer that Mr. G. A. Haley of Woonsocket, R. I., who is well known in theatrical circles throughout the East, has just been appointed as the new manager of the National Theater, Boston, which opened for its season on August 26. Mr. Haley has already started in upon his new duties. Manager Haley is a prominent Elk in Woonsocket, and has been identified with the theatrical business for the last fifteen years. The Tremont-Berkeley Company, owners of the National, selected Mr. Haley from a large list of applicants. The National, which is a B. F. Keith theater, is now on its second season, and is the largest theater in the world that plays to vaudeville and pictures.

Mr. Victor J. Morris of the Orpheum Theater, Boston, a Marcus Loew theater, has brought considerable favorable comment upon his theater this summer. Manager Morris has been giving free entertainments to poor children during the hot weather, and has proven himself a good friend to the young folks.

The South End Theater, Marcus Loew's second Boston House, seems to be doing somewhat better business since the vaudeville has been cut out of the programs. A show of pictures and illustrated songs is given, and Manager Weiss feels that this is the sort of show that will make good with his trade. Mr. Weiss was formerly assistant manager of the Orpheum Theater, Boston, and is making good in his new job.

Exhibitors in Danbury, Conn., report that the Rev. A. T. Steele of their city, is an ardent believer in Motography, and spends considerable time in looking into the educational and religious aspects of motion pictures. Rev. Steele expects to exhibit moving pictures in his church, and promises something new along those lines.

The Santo Domingo Amusement Company has just been formed in Portland, Me., with the purpose of conducting entertainments of moving pictures in Santo Domingo. The promoters are all Portland people, and they intend to invade that island, and to build a chain of moving picture theaters. The corporation is a $50,000 one, with E. N. Noble as president, and E. V. Mann as treasurer. M. S. Matson is the third member, and is also one of the board of directors. Stock will be for sale, with the par value of $5.

Mr. Oscar Wernentin reports that the Iowa Theater, West Second Street, Danbury, Conn., which he has just purchased, is doing quite well. Manager Wernentin hopes to build up a steady patronage by giving his trade a big show of good pictures and songs.

Mr. Harry Stilwell reports that the new theater now being erected in Jackman, Me., is now very nearly completed. The new house, which is modern and cosy, has been named Jackman Station Theater, and will offer pictures and songs, under the management of Mr. Stilwell.

Mr. S. H. Wheeler of Bridgeport, Conn., will soon own a moving picture theater in that city, as plans calling for a 600-seat house are now being made. Mr. Wheeler is to erect a business block and the theater will occupy a portion of the space.

Main and South Colony Streets, Meriden, Conn., has been finally chosen by Mr. Charles Scimbel as the site for the moving picture theater he is about to erect. A modern house is called for by the plans, with a seating capacity of 600 people.

Ipswich, Mass., will have a new theater to play pictures and songs, provided the present plans of Mr. George Goldthorp do not fall through. Mr. Goldthorp is now negotiating for a suitable site upon which to build his house.

The Keith Theater, Portland, Me., may not revert to vaudeville and pictures this fall, as it is the present intention to continue the stock company attractions. The Portland Theater is to offer vaudeville and pictures and this fact may have led to the decision of the Keith house.

A new-comer to the ranks of vaudeville and pictures is the Holyoke Theater, Holyoke, Mass. For the last few years "stock" and melodrama has been sewed up at the Holyoke, but T. F. Murray has decided that it is vaudeville and pictures for him. Labor Day started the Holyoke on its new policy.

The Gaiety and Casino theaters of Boston, and playing burlesque attractions, announce that they will run Sunday evening concerts of vaudeville and pictures.

The Bijou Amusement Company of Springfield, Mass., has announced plans for a new house of old Spanish design. It will seat 3,000, and will be on the site of the present Bijou and Brunswick bowling alleys, on the south side of Worthington Street. The new theater has been leased by George A. Whitney, who recently received an offer from S. Z. Poli for the property. It is hoped to be able to open the new house by November 1, when programs of vaudeville and pictures will be given.

The Keith Theater, Lowell, Mass., has been placed in good shape and should have a good season of vaudeville and pictures.

The Goldstein Brothers of Springfield, Mass., who control a nice string of New England vaudeville and picture houses, announce that they intend to run stock company attractions in the Opera House, North Adams, Mass., during the coming season.

The Marcus Loew Booking Agency of Boston, has removed to its old headquarters, in the Orpheum Theater.

Mr. J. Warren Chase, who has been managing the J. W. Gorman Theater, Floating Bridge Park, near Lynn, Mass., has resigned in order to accept another position.

The Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass., which plays to vaudeville and pictures, opened for its season on August 27. Mr. Jeff Callan, who has made a success of the Lynn Theater, can be seen in charge of the house.

Mr. L. M. Boas, manager of the Academy Theater of Fall River, Mass., has engaged an orchestra for his house, which he thinks will be a big addition to the regular programs of vaudeville and pictures. The Academy is a Marcus Loew house.

Big business has ruled at Greeley's Theater, Portland, Me., ever since it opened under its new name and owner, on August 12. The house has been carefully overhauled by Mr. Greeley, who owns the theater. Licensed pictures, vaudeville, and an orchestra form the programs.

Since I. M. Mosher has become manager of the new Portland Theater, Portland, Me., business has improved. Manager Mosher has made several changes in his house staff. Mr. Mosher was until recently manager of the Big Nickel Theater of Portland.

The Majestic Theater of Keene, N. H., has a new manager in the person of R. W. Snow. This house is owned by Mr. D. P. Alden, and plays vaudeville and pictures.

Messrs. Pulver and Kiefer report that the Opera House of New Milford, Conn., has been a winner, ever since they opened the house on August 7.

William Gane opened his new Witch Theater, Salem, Mass., on Labor Day. This new house seats 1,300, and is a first-class theater in every way. Vaudeville and pictures are to be shown.

The Bijou Theater, Newton, Mass., opened on Labor Day, and is now operated as a moving picture house, under new management.

The Mutual Corporation is finding things to its liking in Boston, and has opened up a large number of New England houses. Mr. Graham, of the Mutual, was in Boston for a few days recently, and expressed himself as being well satisfied with the outlook for his company.

Mr. Herman Rifkin announces that he has completed a deal with the Universal Feature Film Company, 225 West 42nd Street, New York, whereby he will control Universal features in New England. Boston will be the headquarters and Mr. Rifkin is confident that he will open up plenty of business as soon as he is ready to start operations.

Manager Joe Roth of the Olympic Theater, Boston, decided that the Mutual Corporation's service was what his house required, and has hooked up with the Boston office. The W. E. Greene Film Exchange, now owned by the Universal folks, formerly supplied the Olympic.

Manager Appleby of the Star Theater, Boston, may be seen most any day, "beating it" from the theater to the Mutual offices in his new Reo touring car.

Mr. Frank Vine of the Universal Film Exchange, Boston, has left for a trip through Maine and is opening up new business for his concern. Mr. Vine acted in a like capacity for the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, and was retained when that concern was taken over by the Universal.

The New Washington Theater, Boston, has returned to licensed service, after a few weeks with the Mutual people. Mr. F. C. Collier, manager of the Washington, evidently feels that his house thrives on licensed pictures.

It is rumored that the Jolliette Theater, Boston, will re-open this month. The Jolliette was closed last spring, due to the poor business it was having. Should the house open, the owners of the property will be found as the managers. The Jolliette is a house of the old type, and cannot compare in looks with its competitors.

Manager Buckley of the Roxbury and Orienta theaters, Boston, has sold the latter house to Mr. Enwright. The house is now open, and shows independent pictures. The Orienta is another house that has outlived its usefulness, and that cannot stand the competition of its neighbors.

Mr. John Henes, manager of the Apollo Theater, Roxbury, Mass., is now using the pictures of the Film Supply Company, which are handled by the Mutual's Boston office.

On Labor Day, September 2, the Globe Theater, Boston, began what it termed its "regular winter season of all-star vaudeville and the world's best motion pictures." The Globe now runs from 10 A. M. to 10.45 P. M. The price scale is: 10 to 6 P. M., all seats 10 cents. After 6 P. M., the prices are tilted to 10, 15 and 25 cents. A complete change of program is made on Mondays and Thursdays. The Globe is a former "legitimate" theater that has made good with moving pictures.

Mr. Harry Asher, manager of the W. E. Greene Film Exchange of Boston, has been retained in a like capacity by the Universal folks, who bought out Mr. Greene.

Mr. Oliver C. Edwards, who has managed Poli's Theater, Hartford, Conn., is no longer at that house, as he has been transferred to Poli's Theater, New Haven, Conn. Mr. W. D. Ascough has been chosen as manager of the Hartford house.

March 1, 1913, has been the date set for the opening of the new B. F. Keith Theater, at St. John's, N. B. This house will be one of the finest when completed, as no expense has been spared to make it a model vaudeville and picture house.

The Poli Theater, Waterbury, Conn., has decided that its policy this winter will be pictures and vaudeville, and three shows daily are to be given. This is a departure for Waterbury, as two shows daily has been the usual thing in the past.

The Scenic Theater, Westbrook; Greely's Theater, Portland, and the Opera House, Biddeford, all in Maine, have entered into a contract with the General Amusement Company of Boston, whereby that concern supplies them with "tryout" vaudeville acts.

Messrs. Malley and Denison have opened the Opera House, Lawrence, Mass., and business is reported as satisfactory.

The Moving Picture Operators' Protective Union, Local 182, appeared before Judge Morton in the equity Session of the Suffolk Superior Court this week, and asked that the Automatic Vaudeville Company of New York City be restrained from discharging union men, and replacing them with non-union men in the Theater Comique, Premier and New Palace theaters, Boston, which the company owns. As these columns have stated, the Automatic people discharged their union operators, giving as reason that the men were attempting to tell the owners how they should run their business. Mr. Brooks, a member of the corporation, and general manager of the Boston houses, stated that he refused to accept dictation at the hands of his employees, and further added that it was his present intention to fight the case to the limit.

The Opera House of Millentocke, Me., is to have some opposition this year, as the Millentocke Theater has been acquired by Mr. William Jones, who will open the house as soon as some needed improvements are made.

The Empire Theater, Pitsfield, Mass., which has been offering stock-company attractions for some time, has just announced a change of policy. The Empire will now devote itself to the presentation of vaudeville and pictures.

Moving pictures have appealed to the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, as a means of showing up the cruel methods of work in the slaughter houses. Moving pictures have been made that depict the agony horses often are forced to endure and they are to be exhibited in the Massachusetts picture houses. In this way, a most determined effort is to be made to awaken public opinion, and it is hoped that the Cinematograph will lighten the burden of dumb animals.

Mr. O. C. Edwards, who was transferred from the Poli Theater of Hartford, Conn., to the Poli house in New Haven, Conn., was presented with a signet ring last Saturday evening. This was given by the employees, as an appreciation of Mr. Edwards' fair dealings with them.

The Hyperion Theater, New Haven, Conn., for years the "legitimate" theater of that city, has announced a change of policy for this season. The last three nights of the week will be devoted to high-class road attractions, just as in the past; but the first three days will be given over to real moving pictures, with prices from thirty cents downwards.

Mr. Benjamin Jackson has opened his Grand Theater, New Haven, Conn., which was closed for the summer. The house opened to good business, with vaudeville and pictures.

The Hathaway Theater of Lowell, Mass., is now known as the "Playhouse," as the name has been changed. It is under the same ownership.

A marked improvement in the Pastime Theater, Lawrence, Mass., has been noted since the management of the Victoria Theater of Lawrence, acquired the house. Mr. Joseph Blott is now managing the Pastime, while Mr. A. A. Kellman handles the Victoria. A good grade of pictures and songs are used in both theaters, with no vaudeville.

Mr. P. Geroux intends to build a moving picture theater in Newburyport, Mass., provided he can secure a location to suit. Mr. Geroux has a site in mind.

The Gem Theater will soon be ready for its opening in Williamantic, Conn. This house should do well, as it is cozy and modern, with an excellent location, near Hotel Hooker.

Moving pictures and vaudeville are promised for the people of Southbridge, Mass., as the Opera House has been acquired by Blanchard Brothers. A good business should be built up, as competition is not strong.

Mr. A. N. Merrifield of Springfield, Mass., expects to have work started soon on his new moving picture theater, to be built on Main Street.

A new incorporation is the Peoples' Theater Company of New Haven, Conn., which is a $10,000 concern. Mr. Jacob Svirsky has been elected president. This corporation expects to build several houses, all to be devoted to moving pictures. Work is to be started immediately on a new theater in New Haven, which is to be located on Oak Street. Louis Skolnick is treasurer of this company.

HENRY.

LOUISVILLE.

THE coming of the State Fair and the arrival of the National Association of Master Bakers for a big pow-wow during September, both promise a harvest for the picture shows. The bakers' assemblage should bring several thousand good fellows together from every portion of the country, and that they will take in every picture exhibition in the city is a matter of course. Even better returns are to be expected from the State Fair, when tens of thousands of up-state visitors congregate for a week's pleasure in the metropolis.

On October 15 an informal meeting of the Kentucky League of Moving Picture Exhibitors will be held in Louisville. This event is one of supreme interest throughout the photoplay world, for it is promised that a great deal of additional strength for the organization will be recruited. The nucleus of what is forecasted as a credit to the national body has already been formed in Kentucky. An invitation is extended by the officers and members of the league to every exhibitor in the state, urging his attendance at the coming meeting in Louisville. It is expected that at least one hundred enthusiastic members of the trade will respond and that this number will be augmented by the arrival of newcomers all the way from Maysville to Paducah. The Seelbach Hotel has been chosen as headquarters for the gathering, and in addition to an interesting program of business talks and round-table discussions of the exhibitor's problems, entertainment that will be worth while is to be provided. Louisville will leave no stone unturned in showing her compatriots around the state a good time. J. H. Stamper, of Lexington, Ky., will preside at the October meeting as president of the Kentucky League. Preparations locally are being completed by Louis J. Dittmar, vice-president of the league and president of the Majestic Amusement Company, while J. M. Ramsey, of Lexington, is doing good work in his official capacity of secretary.

The Ideal Theater, owned by the Ideal Amusement Company, a corporation controlled by the Broadway Amusement Company, was formally opened to the public Thursday, August 29, with appropriate ceremonies. The house, which is located at Twenty-third and Market Streets, has been more than welcomed by residents of the neighborhood for squares around. It is a handsome establishment of capacity sufficient to compare favorably with that of any similar suburban house in the South, and is offering an excellent program of Licensed films and vaudeville. An admission fee of ten cents is charged and the box office receipts to date bid fair to make the Ideal a leader in local amusement enterprises.

B. F. Keith's Mary Anderson Theater in Louisville, opened about September 8. The Anderson runs Keith's vaudeville, each show being wound up with moving pictures. J. L. Weed has returned to manage the house during the coming season for the Keith interests.

That a moving picture show is as much of an attraction when under the management of the clergy as it is when under the expert guidance of the laicty, is the fact established by the Bardstown Road Presbyterian Church in Louisville. The East End Presbyterian congregation recently held a Progressive Village Fair upon its grounds to raise funds for a new religious edifice on Deerwood Avenue. The Fair boasted of a genuine "bull moose," especially imported for the occasion, much to the edification of the Progressive Highlanders, but the supreme attraction at the big show was an out-door moving picture entertainment under the management of George W. Stroud and H. I. Fox.

Clyde Gaines, of Winchester, Ky., has been awarded a contract to erect a handsome little moving picture theater in Irvine, Ky.

The notable three-reel Selig feature "The Coming of Columbus" has been booked by the Lion Theater in Glasgow, Ky., and has been running for several days with marked success.

George Bleich, a well-known Western Kentucky moving picture exhibitor, is one of the incorporators of the Warrick Theater Company, of Hopkinsville, Ky. The Warrick company is capitalized at $24,000.

"It's Raining Picture Shows" is the vividly descriptive headline employed by a newspaper in Henderson, Ky., in outlining the growth of the photoplay industry in that city. Henderson is making strides toward distinction as one of the best picture cities in western Kentucky.

Stanley Spoehr of Henderson, Ky., is in possession of plans for an up-to-date theater to be built in Main Street and which will be called the Princess. Another handsome house is to be built on property formerly occupied by the Clay Drug Company and Louis Haag in that city, a company of Henderson business men having been formed to back the enterprise.

Safety for the public is to be the leading feature of the new Empress Theater in Owensboro, Ky., which is now in course of erection under the management of George A. Bleich, a well-known Owensboro exhibitor. The auditorium of the Empress is being provided with five exits, exclusive of the main entrance and exit, while the gallery is equipped with two broad stairways. Straight moving pictures are to constitute the program at the new house and the opening is planned for the near future.

E. T. Young, proprietor of the Brown-Proctoria Pharmacy in Winchester, Ky., has purchased a moving picture and vaudeville theater in Versailles, his home city, and is proceeding with the management of his new acquisition.

The Consolidated Theaters Company, recently formed, with a capitalization of $500,000, has taken its first step toward erecting a chain of theaters in Kentucky and elsewhere by beginning work on a new house in Shelbyville, Ky. The newest theater for that town will not be especially elaborate, having a seating capacity of about 300, fitted to the size of the place. The theater will be opened some time during the fall.

"Rip Van Winkle," a two-reel Vitagraph feature, was the Majestic Theater's offering for Labor Day, and it bucked numerous rival attractions in handsome style, reaping quite a harvest for the management of the Majestic.

President Simon, of the Princess Amusement Company, has returned to Louisville and work after a summer spent on the Great Lakes. One of Mr. Simon's first ventures on assuming his duties in Louisville was the presentation of anti-tuberculosis films for the State Board of Health during State Fair week in Louisville, September 9-14. The State organization set aside a handsome appropriation for the purpose of furthering its fight against the great white plague, and engaged Mr. Simon to exhibit the films. A tent was erected on the State Fair grounds, and everything conducted along approved lines. Admission to the exhibition was free to the thousands of visitors who were in Louisville for the fair. The results of the display of the anti-tuberculosis films were highly satisfactory to the State Board of Health. The State Fair show was given under the personal supervision of A. F. Mayer, treasurer of the Princess Amusement Company. Mr. Mayer has just returned from his summer's outing, which he spent around Chicago and the Great Lakes.

"The Passing Parade," an Eclair American film, seen at the Novelty theater recently, offered much out of the ordinary. It pleased a big Sunday crowd at the Fourth Street house. Despite hot weather, the Novelty has done a heavy volume of business and Manager Dave Levinson is highly satisfied with the outlook.

M. Switow, head of the Falls Cities Amusement Company, has completed interior alterations in the Grand Theater, New Albany, Ind. The house was re-decorated and the seating capacity enlarged.

A new moving picture theater in Hopkinsville, Ky., is being rushed to completion and will be opened in October, according to present plans.

The old Comet Theater, in the Odd Fellows' building, in Paris, Ky., is now being remodeled and will be re-opened about October 1, under a new name. A new front is being installed, while new fixtures and a modern ventilating system will be features of the place after the work is completed. An admission fee of five cents will be charged. Universal film service will be used exclusively.

L. H. Ramsey, owner of the Annex and Hippodrome theaters, of Lexington, Ky., is one of the incorporators of the Western Exhibitors' Feature Film Company, which recently was formed at a meeting held in Cincinnati. Exhibitors of Cleveland, Detroit and other cities are said to be interested in the new concern, which will work on a co-operative basis in the matter of buying and using foreign and American films.

Clancy, has resigned his position there to take up a position as General Circuit Manager for Treon & Company, operating a chain of picture houses in Scranton, Pittston and Wilkes-Barre. For a number of years Mr. Smith was connected with the Poli houses, previous to which he was manager of the Old Family Theater on Adams Street.

West Philadelphia is to have another large motion picture playhouse, which will be located at Nos. 5149-51 Woodland Avenue, and which will cost in the neighborhood of $25,000. Charles E. Flutcher is the owner of the new house.

A moving picture theater at Eighth Street and Washington Avenue was closed recently by Fire Marshal Lattimer because in his opinion the building is unsafe, due to defective electric light wiring. The theater is said to be overcrowded every night with women and children, and if a fire should happen to break out there would be a big chance of a serious outcome. Every house in the southern section of the city will be inspected in the course of the next few weeks, and it is the opinion of Fire Marshal Lattimer that a number of them will be compelled to close down.

Announcement was made a few days ago that William W. Miller, of the William Penn Theater, has acquired the Plaza Theater, at Broad and Porter Streets. He will build on the site a handsome modern theater as one of a chain of popular price houses which he intends erecting in this city. The new theater which will include a balcony and private boxes, will have a capacity of over 3,000. It is expected that the theater will be ready for occupancy at the close of the year.

Frank W. Buhler, the progressive manager of the Bijou Dream Theater on Market Street, is showing some class in the literary line by writing for the press of Philadelphia. It was only a few days ago that an article appeared in the Philadelphia Times under the name of Mr. Buhler.

Mr. Bradenburgh, of the Independent Film Service, has been given the agency for the Germania films of Duseldorf, Germany, their stars being Asta Neilson, Madam Gerhard and other leading lights of the motion picture industry of Europe. Miss Neilson is now in Spain, staging some of the famous Castillian plays. These films are released with special music.

Work has been begun on extensive alterations to the old Reigel Building, No. 333 Market Street, by William Steel & Sons Company, to convert the place into a motion picture theater. A lease has been taken for a term of years by the Moving Picture Company of America. There will be entrances both on Market Street and on Fourth Street. The Franklin theater, at Fifty second Street and Girard Avenue, was the scene of a most notable musical event of its kind that was ever enacted in Philadelphia when Charles White dedicated the Hope Jones Unit Orchestra, which J. Hesser Walraven and Leon T. Carpenter have installed in that playplay house. The instrument is unique in the extreme, consisting of an entire symphony orchestra. A very pretty private musical was given after the regular performances for the many persons who were anxious to examine the unit orchestra to try and ascertain now and where the tone quality of the instrument came from. Mrs. Gale Natt Campbell, the soloist of the Franklin theater, presided over the instrument at the recital and showed remarkable talent in her orchestration as well as her technique.

The Aurora theater on Germantown Avenue, will have a matinee every day, and in addition the manager, Mr T. M. Pierce, has installed a new daylight screen.

Manager Harry Davis, of the Bijou Dream Theater of Milton, Pa., one of the most up-to-date picture men in the country, has arranged with the Gaumont Company to take pictures of that city, which he will use in his own house, after which he will send them throughout the State to advertise Milton as a commercial and business city. Mr. Davis has been in the picture business from the beginning, and there is nothing in the line that he does not know.

F. H. MADISON.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE local branch of the Y. M. C. A. makes weekly use of the motion picture in their magnificent hall, where a concrete booth and complete projection equipment is installed. The subjects are carefully chosen by their Mr. Strickler and usually consist of religious, educational and scenic pictures. Upon occasion special reels are made up, a recent one being "The Making of a Man," which was produced with the co-operation of the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Strickler also superintended the filming of this year's outing which was held on Labor Day. There a barbecue was held and various spectacular athletic events were indulged in. About 1,000 feet of film was secured. This will be shown first in this city, after which date the reel will be sent to the Eastern headquarters, and from there will be loaned the various Y. M. C. A. branches throughout the United States.

The Warners Feature Film Exchange at San Francisco, was opened August 26th, by Mr. M. Levinson, who will be the local manager.

A number of the local exhibitors are having their Wurlitzer automatic pianos rebuilt by the Wurlitzer agents, Kohler & Chase. In this rebuilt instrument the music roll is under the control of the musician, and a "double tracker board" is being built into some of them. This, of course, means for the exhibitor, noninterrupted music and quick change of selection.

Mr. Lester L. Kahn paid his San Francisco branch of the Golden Gate Film Exchange a flying visit recently in order to confer with his business associate and manager, Mr. Lesser. Immediately upon Mr. Kahn's return to the Southern metropolis, the Los Angeles branch will commence making releases. The San Francisco exchange will thus be relieved of quite a bit of the "long-haul business" which it has been taking care of pending the opening of its sister exchange south of the Tehachapi.

Mr. F. B. Thompson, who is representing the Edison Home Kinetoscope, called recently on the San Francisco representative of the "World." Mr. Thompson is taking, with his wife, a long deferred vacation trip. An auto was the mode of conveyance from Los Angeles to this city, and many side trips were made from the main road while on the way up. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson left for Orange via Chicago, at which point they will make a short stop.

Sacramento's latest motion picture theater, The Actograph, was opened with an exclusive picture program. The four Independent pictures shown daily are being supplied by the California Film Exchange.

The local organization of Moving Picture Operators commemmorated its eighth birthday with a banquet and entertainment about the middle of August, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. One hundred and twenty covers were laid, and none was idle. Music for the occasion was donated by the Empress Theater orchestra, and vaudeville talent was volunteered by members of the White Rat and A. A. A. Unions. Motion pictures were not on the program, there being a city ordinance prohibiting the installation of a machine in the café where the festivities were held.

The Mission Theater has been under the direct management of the owners, Cooley & "Kid" Mohler (of baseball fame), for the past month. But their coming trip East compels their relinquishment of that honor, Mr. J. A. Morie taking up the duties upon their departure. He will continue the present policy of Independent pictures with a daily change, with vaudeville acts on two nights and matinee each week.

The Liberty Theater, under the management of Brown & Estes, are changing licensed pictures on Saturday, Tuesday and Thursday nights instead of twice a week only as heretofore. Thus their patrons who attend the Friday nights' "Amateur Show," will see new photoplays instead of the ones shown on the previous evenings.

Another indication of the popularity of the motion picture actor is being given by the announcement by the local manufacturers of a widely known confection that the baseball pictures which have been packed in each carton of their goods would give way to "photographs of a photoplay actor or actress."

The Unique Theater has just installed a semi-automatic type of organ, which has included within one case an organ, piano and sound effect box. It was used for the first time with the Vitagraph "Rip Van Winkle." The success of and the favorable comments upon this machine has caused the management to rush an order for a similar one for their other theater, the V. Odeon. Two operators will be employed in each house, the music in both being under the direction of M. Bacigalupi, a musician of local note.

The Peerless Theater, which opened with licensed service several weeks ago, began showing Independent pictures Sept. 2nd. The service is supplied by the Golden Gate Film Exchange, a daily change of program being made as before. As the date for the State convention approaches the outlook for an entirely successful meeting grows more rosy. This week the new lapel emblems were distributed and that handsome pin now adorns the top-coat of nearly every motion picture exhibitor in California. The publicity committee is making good use of nearly every advertising method known, and the replys from all parts of the State point to a largely attended meeting. The visiting members upon arrival will be taken in hand by the transportation and hotel committee, which will see that each and every member and his accompanying friends secure first-class accommodations at the official hotel.

"ANDY."

INDIANAPOLIS.

THE Alhambra, one of the finest motion picture houses in the city, has opened for business. It is owned by Dickson & Talbott, who also operate the Orpheum, and was built at a cost of about $25,000. The house is located in Washington Street, a few doors east of Illinois Street, and is regarded as one of the best locations in the city. Fireproof construction was used throughout and the house has a seating capacity of about 800. The exterior of the front is embellished in tile and terra cotta, and is extremely artistic in appearance. High grade motion pictures are being shown, and an admision fee of ten cents is charged.

O. J. Davy has received from the city building inspection department a permit to erect a motion picture theater at 2328 Brookside Avenue. OTTAWA.

THE development of the moving picture business in Canada is evidenced in the incorporation of two large new companies, notice of which was printed in the "Canada Gazette."One is the International Moving Picture Manufacturing Company, Limited, the capital stock of which amounts to one million dollars, divided into as many shares at one dollar each. Business will be carried on with Montreal as headquarters. The incorporators are James Edward Day, James Melton Adam, and Edward V. O'Sullivan. Some of the powers granted to the company are as follows: to acquire and maintain theaters, halls and places of entertainment for the display of moving pictures, and the carrying on of theatrical representations; to carry on the business of a film exchange, theatrical agents, amusement managers and of dramatic publishers.

Montreal Motion Pictures, Limited, is the second company, which has been incorporated. The capital stock amounts to $100,000 in one dollar shares, and the head offices in this case also will be at Montreal. This company is empowered to engage in the manufacture of moving pictures, specific clauses in the charter providing for the acquisition of machinery and buildings; agreements with actors, authors, publishers, etc., and generally to carry on the business of supplying anything capable of being used in connection with providing of amusement. The incorporators are Albert Joseph Gariepy and William Henry Zalde.

Mr. C. L. Woerner, formerly of Reading, Penn., has decided to establish a large moving picture theater at Eastview, a suburb of Ottawa. A gang of men are now engaged fitting up a suitable building, which will be ready for business by the first of next month. It will accommodate 400 people, and will have a stage 20 by 16 feet. The house will be known as the Woerner Theatorium.

PORTLAND.

CONTRACTS have been signed by the Peoples' Amusement Company to exhibit Blanche Walsh in Tolstoy's "Resurrection" and the "Power of Destruction" throughout their circuit.

M. G. Winstock, general manager of the Peoples' Amusement Company, has been appointed by Governor West, of Oregon, as a delegate to the National Prison Congress which meets in Baltimore. After the session of this Congress, Mr. Winstock will study over the film situation in the East, and then go abroad, accompanied by Mrs. Winstock, to purchase cameras and other paraphernalia for the new film factory that is to be established in this city. In a personal interview with Mr. M. G. Winstock, he said: "I want you to tell the public that the Peoples' Amusement Company has no connection whatsoever with the Film Supply Co. of Oregon, nor has it any connection with the proposed establishment of the Lunagraph Company that is planning to turn out some film that will mystify the public. These two concerns are absolutely controlled by different stockholders and are not dictating one another's policies."

"Lucile" is being exhibited at the Peoples' Theater for an indefinite time. Twenty four-sheet stands are being used to advertise this masterpiece, and the same stands are being put up for Tolstoy's "Resurrection" and "The Power of Destruction."

The Peoples Amusement Company's cameraman is planning to take pictures of the horse races at the country club in Portland, and also of the famous regatta races at Astoria and the completion of the Hill electric road at Eugene, Ore.

To assist in the upbuilding and advertising of the great Oregon country, the Peoples' Amusement Company has promised to aid the commercial organizations of the state by giving them the use of the cameraman to film subjects of interest to be shown throughout the United States.

Plans are under consideration to change the Star Theater in Portland. The cost of this change will amount to $25,000. The front of the theater will be built on the plan of a shell effect, making it one of the handsomest entrances in the country.

G. M. Metzger, general manager of the Film Supply Company of Oregon, has returned from a trip throughout the state, securing contracts for the renting of film through this exchange, which is becoming popular along the Coast.

KALEM.

THE POACHER'S PARDON (Sept. 30).—The old gamekeeper knows that a poacher is operating on the estate, but all efforts to capture the hunter prove unavailing. Dora, the gamekeeper's daughter, meets Jim, the poacher, but knows nothing of his vocation, and the young couple fall in love. One day she discovers him at work. Just at this moment the gamekeeper appears, and by an artful subterfuge Dora shields Jim.

That night Dora overhears a consultation which takes place between her father and some of his neighbors, in which they plan to capture the mysterious poacher. Stealing out of the house Dora proceeds to search for Jim and is accidentally shot by one of the party who is endeavoring to locate the hunter. She manages to warn Jim, who makes his escape.

Visiting the tavern Jim learns that his sweetheart has been wounded. He abandons his illegal occupation and becomes an honest workman. A few weeks later Dora recovers and when Jim meets her he convinces the girl that he has proven worthy of her love.

A HOSPITAL HOAX (Oct. 2).—Tom becomes infatuated with a strange young woman and learns that she is a nurse in the local hospital. He determines to make her acquaintance and feigns illness that he may be taken to the hospital. Tom, however, makes the mistake of confiding in his friend, Bill, who, being a practical joker, sees an opportunity to have some fun at Tom's expense. Bill communicates with the hospital and informs Nora, the nurse, that Tim is laying siege to her heart through crafty subterfuge. Nora and the doctors then proceed to make things lively for the invalid (?) and Tom forgets his romance in a strenuous escape.

ANCIENT TEMPLES OF EGYPT (Oct. 2).—As the tourists wander about the old temples of Luxor they marvel at the avenue of columns. Mounting donkeys they journey to Karnak, about two miles distant. The great hall of the Temple at Karnak is very impressive and we behold a gigantic column in the foreground, which measures 23 feet in circumference. Under the temple is the king's secret passageway and a weird atmosphere pervades the scene.

The travelers cross the River Nile and enter the ancient town of Thebes. Through the Valley of Death to the Rest House they journey and are confronted by grotesque skulls of mummies, thousands of years old. Returning to Luxor the tourists are just in time to witness a quaint Mohammedan procession.

THE VILLAGE VIXEN (Oct. 4).—The ungovernable temper of Eva Storm has caused her to be known as "The Village Vixen." Her charming daughter, Maud, is the antithesis of her mother, and promises her hand to Willis, a wealthy young farmer.

Eva forbids Willis from visiting her home and the young man asks his father to help him in overcoming the unreasonable prejudice of the vixen. Harrison calls on Eva and asks her to explain why she objects to his son. But it is not in keeping with Eva Storm's nature to listen to reason and she dismisses Harrison. On the way home Harrison meets Maud and has her write the following note:

"Dear Mother: Willis is a good man and I love him. I do not know why you separate us. I cannot bear it and am going away."

Maud places the note on her table and then goes to the Harrison home. When Eva discovers the message she is highly indignant—then becomes apprehensive. She calls on Harrison and accuses him of complicity, but the appearance of Willis indicates that the young couple have not eloped. All through the village Eva searches for her daughter and finally returns home.

The unhappy woman mourns the loss of her daughter and realizes that she has brought this great sorrow to herself. There is a happy reunion of mother and daughter, and Willis is no longer forbidden from visiting his sweetheart.

THE CONFEDERATE IRONCLAD (Oct. 5).—Lieutenant Yancey's southern sweetheart, Rose, is jealous of Elinor, a northern girl, who is visiting her aunt, Mary de Lane. This jealousy is excited by an invitation which Yancey receives from Mary to call and meet her niece. Yancey visits the de Lane home, and while walking along the river with Elinor, he shows her where the Confederate Ironclad is being constructed. Elinor, having strong Union sympathies, reveals the location of the Ironclad to the commander of the Federal gunboats.

An attack is made on the Ironclad and Yancey rides to give warning. The Confederates are temporarily helpless as their power is exhausted. Yancey, knowing that a supply of ammunition is loaded on a train in another location, prepares to bring the needed powder to his compatriots.

As the train is about to leave, a Federal scouting party rides up and opens fire. Rose and Yancey jump on the engine and make a wild dash to escape with the powder. Elinor, from a distance, sees the fight and sets fire to the bridge over which the train must pass.

While riding over the bridge the last car catches fire. Yancey, who has been wounded, is left in the engine cab while Rose crawls over the loaded train and succeeds in cutting off the end car just in time to escape the explosion. The powder is delivered to the Ironclad in the nick of time, and a fierce battle wages between the Confederate vessel and the Union gunboats.

ECLIPSE.

A FOE TO RACE SUICIDE (Oct. 2).—Percy is a reckless youth, leading a gay and extravagant life, much to the disgust of his wealthy father. He returns home one night in a rather doubtful condition and is met by his parent who turns him out. Percy leaves the house very much depressed and attempts to end his life by jumping into the river, but is rescued by a girl, to whom he immediately proposes matrimony and is married.

Ten years later the old father still mourns for his lost son. One day he receives a letter which, after praising his many charitable deeds, requests his assistance for a young couple who are overburdened with the care of ten children.

He hurries off to investigate and, to his amazement, finds his own son surrounded by a crowd of noisy youngsters. The old man is satisfied that Percy has "paid the penalty" for his past shortcomings, and determines to let bygones be bygones.

A TRIP THROUGH BELGIUM (Oct. 2).—This small but densely populated country offers an endless number of interesting sights for tourists. We are shown scenes in the cities of Brussels, Bruges, Liege, and Ostend and a remarkable exhibition of shrimp fishing on horseback.

CINES.

HOW A BRAVE MAN DIED (Oct. 1).—His fearless spirit undaunted by many adversities, Murat, a former dashing leader of Napoleon's cavalry, and later King of Naples, lands with his followers at Calabria, in southern Italy, in an attempt to regain his kingdom.

Although anticipating a rousing welcome by the people, Murat's expedition proves a complete fiasco. He and his friends are fiercely attacked by the coast guards, overwhelmed by force of numbers, and put to rout. Most of his followers escape in their ships, but Murat is captured and imprisoned in the Castle of Pizzo, where he is subjected to all sorts of indignities. After a mock trial he is condemned to death and is allowed only a half hour for religious consolation. At the apointed time the brave man is led out and forced to face a file of soldiers with leveled muskets. "Aim at my heart!" are his last words.

THE ISLAND OF MALTA (Oct. 1).—Lying fifty miles directly south of Sicily, Malta is an important possession of the British Empire, especially as a naval base. The film shows the town of Valetta, its splendid harbor, the great underground storehouses for grain, the governor's palace and many other interesting sights of the city.

TRIFLE NOT WITH LOVE (Oct. 5).—All the girls at the house party are in love with George. They discuss his many qualities and vie with each other to be first in his affections. Belle, one of the prettiest of his admirers even makes a wager that she will win him.

George is rather overwhelmed with attention, but is inclined to favor Belle until Rose, a younger girl, whispers the fact of the wager to him. Believing then that Belle is only in fun he openly neglects her. She is broken-hearted at this, for she really loves George to distraction and consequently grows listless and melancholy. George becomes equally miserable, having fallen in love with Belle, but dares not tell her on account of the wager. When things are darkest little Rose realizes the situation, for which she is much to blame, and arranges to patch things up in a very ingenious manner as only the film can describe.

LAINO (SOUTHERN ITALY) (Oct. 5).—Commencing with a series of general views of this quaint Italian town, the film then shows several public buildings, and many quaint illustrations of native life and pursuits. Among its other attractions Laino boasts of containing the narrowed street in all Italy.

VITAGRAPH.

HER CHOICE (Sept. 30).—Without an heir, Mrs. Letitia Summers, the principal and proprietor of a most fashionable and exclusive boarding school, decides to give her two nieces an education and at the same time select one of them as her heir. Without letting them know who she is, she writes each a letter, stating that a lady of means has provided for their education at Mrs. Summers' seminary. Edith receives the announcement with joy. May, the other niece, who lives in another part of the country, is delighted with the news. Immediately she demands of her mother a lot of new things in order to satisfy her vanity and desire to make an impression. May, with her new clothes and outfit, attracts considerable attention when she arrives at the school. Edith, in her modest wardrobe and old-fashioned carpet bag, is received with disparaging remarks.

At the end of the school course, the two girls graduate with creditable showing in their studies. After the graduating exercises, Mrs. Summers calls the two girls into her private office and tells them that she is their aunt, and she has chosen Edith as her heir in recognition of her kindness and thoughtfulness for others, particularly for her poor mother.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE SMELLING SALTS (Oct. 1).—It is discovered that a large amount of diamonds are being brought into this country by a clever smuggler. The case is assigned to Lambert Chase, the detective, who employs a female assistant. Nellie Croy is suspected of the crime. Lambert Chase and his assistant trail her to a steamship ticket office, where they learn that she has secured passage to America. Immediately Chase reserves a stateroom adjoining Nellie's for his assistant, and another one for himself. Chase bores a hole through the partition between his assistant's and the smuggler's cabin, so that her every action can be carefully watched. He arranges with the captain of the boat to reverse the engines and give an alarm that there is possible danger. Chase's assistant is instructed to watch what Nellie seizes in her excitement, supposing that she will try to save that which she considers most valuable. She grabs a bottle of smelling salts and rushes from the cabin. This locates where she has concealed the diamonds. To fasten the crime upon her, Chase instructs his assistant when they land, during the examination of the luggage, on the other side, to faint and he will borrow the bottle of smelling salts from Nellie Croy. This plan is carried out, and he lets the bottle fall onto the floor. It breaks and the diamonds are exposed and the smuggler arrested.

BACHELOR BUTTONS (Oct. 2).—Bunny comes to the conclusion that no one loves a fat bachelor, and he will go out in the fields and curtail his miserable existence at the end of a rope. Contemplating this rash step, a dog comes along, seizes the rope and makes off with it. Bunny gives chase and throws a stick at the dog. He playfully drops the rope off the bridge and picks up the stick. Bunny more miserable than ever, returns to his home. The dog follows him. Bunny sitting disconsolate in his own little room, weeps over his unhappy fate. The dog enters, looks up sympathetically at him. Bunny prepares a frugal repast and proceeds to partake of it. The dog jumps on a chair beside him. This arouses the poor bachelor's attention. He offers the dog food, but she refuses to eat until he has helped himself first. Then she accepts some. At last, the lonely man has found a companion who cares for him and his interest in life is reawakened and he continues to live on, forgetting the trials and tribulations of the past.

DIANA'S LEGACY (Oct. 2).—By the death of a distant relative, a circus attache, Miss Diana Stubbins, an old maid, is left a baby elephant. The bequest is delivered at Diana's home and on the night of the day of its arrival, it is stolen by burglars, in lieu of anything else of value. Diana reports to the police that she has lost a baby, terrible news; and they make a thorough search for the missing child, which she later informs them is an elephant. The guardians of the law lose interest and the elephant is forgotten. In the meantime, the thieves, finding that they have an elephant on their hands, which may be their undoing, bring it back to Diana's home, and she finds it there upon her return from the police station.

Her delight is unbounded and the elephant has everything his own way. He is the light and life of her cherished and visionary hopes.

SHE CRIED (Oct. 3).—Mame is not very handsome, but she has an accomplishment that stands her in good stead. She can cry most effectively. She applied for a position in a box factory, and when she learns there is no vacancy for her, she cries so piteously a place is made for her, in which she is a downright failure. When told she is not competent, she pipes out another cry that lands her in another position in another department. This is the last straw, and all the bosses come to the conclusion that she is useless and tell her that her services are no longer required. This starts her to crying with increased energy, which brings the bosses to a consultation and a decision to turn her over to "Red" Grogan, the toughest and most dominating boss in the place. For a day or two they hear nothing from Mame, who has been dubbed the "Boss Weeper." She disappears, and with her, "Red" Grogan, who leaves a note, saying "Me and Mame was married this morning. I will be back to work in a week."

HER SPOILED BOY (Oct. 4).—Bobby Bristow becomes a self-willed and impetuous youth, beyond control and reason. He reads of opportunities in the unsettled West for young men and begs his mother to give him money to go there.

Reaching the West, and securing occupation with a farmer, he leaves him in a huff when he finds he cannot do as he pleases. He tries his hand at ranching, does not accept the pleasantries of his fellows gracefully and again finds himself out of a job. He writes his mother for more money, telling her that he has a good position, and will receive his wages at the end of the month. She mails him a letter, enclosing his request. Desperate and in need of funds, he holds up the very stagecoach carrying the mail and his mother's letter to him. He steals the mail bag, makes his way across the hills to a deserted cabin, where he examines its contents and discovers the letter from his mother. The robbery is reported to the officers and a posse starts in pursuit of Bobby. When he reads his mother's letter and realizes the sacrifice she has made for him, he is conscience-stricken, and determines to give himself up. On his own confession, he is convicted and serves the penalty of his crime in jail.

After his discharge he returns home, thoroughly repentant and determined to make amends to his poor mother for his past dishonor, never letting her know his experiences in the West, his arrest or imprisonment.

THE RED BARRIER (Oct. 5).—Count Sergius ingratiates himself into the favor of Professor Bain, and induces the old gentleman to consent to sacrifice his daughter Isabel upon the altar of Mammon, and wear his titled yoke. She loves Lieutenant Bruce, of the United States Navy, and refuses to give the Count his answer. Isabel reads in the newspapers that the Lieutenant has gone to Genoa. She is surprised and greatly piqued, because he did not come to bid her good-bye, and accepts his indifference as conclusive that he does not care for her. The fact is, that Bruce sent her a note asking permission to call and it was never delivered. In the anger of her disappointment, she consents to become the wife of the Count.

Two years later, Isabel and the Count are living in luxury and unhappiness in St. Petersburg, Russia. A State Ball is given, which officers plenipotentiary attend. Count Sergius, with Isabel, are there. Lieutenant Bruce, visiting St. Petersburg, is present. Later, Isabel sees Bruce and faints. Bruce rushes to her side and supports her to a seat. At this moment, Sergius enters. Bruce offers his hand, which the Count refuses, roughly seizes his wife and takes her to another part of the ballroom. Here he threatens to strike her. Bruce rushes forward, grabs the Russian and throws him to one side. Sergius demands an apology and insults Bruce, who is constrained from beating the Russian. Cards are exchanged, and a duel between the two men is arranged.

Bruce and the Count meet upon the dueling field. Isabel witnesses it all, praying for the safety of Bruce. At the exchange of shots, the Russian falls dead. Bruce visits Isabel. They meet in the parlor of her home, where she greets him with a love which has ever been his and he declares the love which has ever been hers.

NOTHING TO WEAR (Oct. 7).—A woman never has anything to wear, particularly if she is going anywhere out of the ordinary. This happens to be the case when Karl Schultz, a butcher, invites Susan, Mrs. Coster's maid, to attend a swell affair with him. Susan almost gives up in despair, when suddenly she is struck with a brilliant idea. Entering the parlor, her eyes light on the lamp shade, which she utilizes, with a few artificial flowers, from a vase as a very modish, mushroom hat. Taking down the portieres, she uses them as a very stylish dress. The brass rings and fastenings are her jewels, finishing off with a lace table cover which she wears as a shawl. Karl is struck with pride and amazement as he beholds her finery, convinced that she will be the best-dressed woman of the evening; and she is.

Mr. and Mrs. Coster return home from the theater. They discover the loss of their furnishings and come to the conclusion that they have been robbed. They notify the police. Later, Susan comes home, tries to replace her outfit. She is detected by the Costers, and the police take her to the station house. She notifies Karl, who comes to her aid. She makes a full confession and with the furnishings, in the presence of the Sergeant, gives a practical demonstration of how she used them. Her ingenuity is thoroughly appreciated by Karl and Mr. and Mrs. Coster. Of course she is forgiven and the whole affair is looked upon as an unusual bit of pleasantry.

ESSANAY.

GHOSTS (Oct. 1).—Colonel de Valpeau lives alone with his negro servant, Zeno. Being pressed for ready funds, the Colonel is refused a loan on the hereditary estate, and is threatened with eviction. Zeno now decides upon a plan whereby his master may remain in the great house without his presence being discovered, and shows the Colonel a sliding panel in the dining room wall that leads to a small garret inside. The Dixons, wealthy social climbers, now purchase the place, but firmly believe the place is haunted when they find the table has been used for mysterious company during the night and catch sight of the sliding panel shutting behind old Zeno as he goes to his master. Therefore, they leave in fright and refuse to purchase the place, which is now bought by Dr. Trueman. One evening, as the doctor and his friends are chatting, they catch Zeno coming through the panel and force him to disclose the secret. Upon learning of the colonel's identity the doctor writes him a note saying the old estate is his as long as he lives and that his presence is desired that evening. Finding the old-fashioned costume of one of his French ancestors in a trunk, the colonel dons it and is presented to the gentlemen in the great dining room. However, the strain of proposing a toast to his king is too much for the aged man, and he dies.

WELL MATCHED (Oct. 2).—Tom West and "Cuty" Gray, old sweethearts, who have not seen each other in five years, have grown enormously stout. They arrange to come on to the city and meet each other. The first thought each has is to find some method of reducing flesh, and both see Dr. Thin's advertisement in the paper, telling of his wonderful methods of reducing, etc. So both, unknown to the other, start in training at the obesity "cure." Without discovering identities they find a way to slip written notes back and forth under the partition that separates the two departments, exchanging compliments and confessing why they have to reduce. This is kept up at some length and the complications are highly amusing, as they tell each other their real weights and laugh at "themselves" in general without once knowing it. Finally each discovers they are heavier than when they started, and agree to quit and go out and have lunch together. Of course, it is not until they are taking leave of Dr. Thin that they come face to face, and recognize each other. Explanations are forthcoming and, deciding they like fat people best of all, they make haste to the nearest restaurant and enjoy a good square meal.

THE REDEMPTION OF SLIVERS (Oct. 3).—Detected in the act of stealing a wealthy woman's scarf from an auto, "Slivers," a thief, escapes from the clutches of a pursuing policeman and jumps a moving freight train. He applies at the Prescott farmhouse for something to eat, but refuses to work in payment until he meets Alice, the old farmer's charming daughter. The sight of her sets him on the right track and he is given work by Prescott. The discovery is made one evening by the Prescotts that "Sliver" cannot read, but the former thief secures a grammar, and he pores over the book until he delights Alice with his self-taught knowledge. Gradually a bond of affection springs up between the two that rapidly develops into love. "Slivers" makes good on the farm, and, at last, wins the consent of the Prescotts to marry Alice. A few days later Paul Prescott, Alice's brother, arrives back at the old farm on his vacation, and proves to be none other than the policeman from whom "Slivers" escaped that eventful day in the city. Informed of Alice's approaching marriage Paul hastens out to the orchard to meet his future brother-in-law, and the two men come face to face. Furiously Paul upbraids "Slivers" and is about to fell him to the ground when the ex-thief brokenly pleads for a chance to prove his complete reformation. Paul relents, clasps him by the hand, takes him back to the old folks, declares "Slivers" is an old friend, and gives Alice over to him.

TERRIBLE TEDDY (Oct. 4).—Lillian Boggs receives a telegram from her childhood sweetheart in the West saying that he is coming East to see her. Now Lillian loves Teddy Moose, her Western hero, and tells her other two suitors, Stepplng and Calvert, that they will have to prove their courage before Teddy arrives in order to receive any consideration. Stepplng engages the services of a thug to attack Lillian in the park so that he may play the hero. The plan works fine until the very moment that John is about to rush to Lillian's aid, when he is captured by a fair flirt and is only brought to his senses when Lillian appears with the thug she has battered up, and Stepplng receives a black eye from the enraged fellow, and is stung when both the flirt and Lilian leave him in disgust. Meanwhile, Calvert persuades his pal, Bailey, to impersonate Teddy Moose from the West, frighten old Boggs to death so that he may come in and throw him out at the proper moment and win the girl. The scheme is going great and Bailey, in the disguise of a wholly "badman," is raising Cain in the Boggs' residence, and has just been thrown out by Calvert when the real Teddy appears on the scene, exposes the fake to Lillian and her father, then kicks both plotters down the steps.

LOVE ON TOUGH LUCK RANCH (Oct. 5).—Old Jim Parsons, a ranchman, desires that his daughter, Ethel, shall marry old man Carney, a little dried up, weazened character. Ethel refuses to marry Carney. One morning a young stranger, Horace Vinton, is thrown from his horse and sustains a broken arm. Ethel and her father find him and Ethel cares for him at the ranchhouse until he recovers. Of course, the young people fall in love at sight, and old Carney finds them with heads together one day, summons Parsons, and young Vinton is ordered away from the ranch. Ethel manages to smuggle a note to him begging him to rescue her from Carney. Vinton replies by saying he will elope with her that night. The elopement takes place and the young people get a fine start of old Parsons and Carney, who attempt to overtake them in Carney's "ottermobile." Quite naturally the machine takes a notion to run over a few yards of rail fence, lands in the ditch and sticks there. So while the marriage knot is being tied, the old men cuss each other. Of course, the young newly-weds run across them on the way back. They hitch the disabled machine to the back of the rig, and after receiving parental blessings, the youngsters start back slowly to the ranch.

LUBIN.

A GIRL'S BRAVERY (Sept. 30).—Harry Tennant and friends are camping at Great Falls. In unpacking their effects they discover that the eggs have been broken. Harry departs upon a search for eggs. Crossing the Ohio Canal, he comes upon Mrs. Mason, the lockkeeper's wife. Mrs. Mason refuses Harry's request for eggs. Emily, her daughter, secures some for him. Harry returns to camp and the memory of the pretty face. The acquaintance thus made is continued, and the young people rapidly reach a stage where their interest bids fair to ripen into love. The return of John, Emily's brother, who has been on a trip with his canal boat, brings trouble. Coming unexpectedly upon the couple, John orders Harry from the place and forbids him to again meet his sister. Harry sends Emily a note, making an appointment, which she keeps. John witnesses the meeting and, following Harry, comes upon him at the crossing of one of the locks. An altercation follows and John hurls Harry into the swift flowing current. Madge, a young village girl, witnesses the fight and rushes away seeking aid. The current carries Harry down into the river, where he is seen by Emily. The brave girl jumps in after her lover and brings him to shore. Madge has arrived with assistance and helps pull the exhausted girl and her burden onto the bank. John's anger has subsided and he is horror-stricken at having, as he thinks, committed a murder. Realizing that he must leave the section of the country, he returns by night with the idea of seeking his sister's aid. She tells him of Harry's rescue and John, relieved, is only too glad to accompany his sister to Harry's camp, express his regret for his hasty action, and, assured of Harry's honorable intentions, consents to their engagement.

THE AMATEUR ICE MAN (Oct. 2).—James Westcott and John Baxter are two business acquaintances. Baxter has a daughter, Betty, whose indolent habits are a source of displeasure. One day she dresses herself as a maid and determines to demonstrate that she can be useful. Westcott has a son, Roy, who is busily engaged in sowing wild oats. Wescott's patience finally becomes exhausted, and he demands that Roy shall go to work, starting at the bottom by driving one of his father's ice wagons. Roy consents. Among the houses where Roy delivers ice is Baxter's. He sees Betty, and falls in love with her. That night he calls on her, in his character of iceman. The romance progresses until one hot day when Baxter meets Westcott and invites him to his front porch to have a cool drink. Betty, in her role of maid, goes to prepare it. Finding the ice box empty, she steps out on the rear porch to see if the iceman is coming. Roy appears with a great cake of ice and the young people stop to chat. The cake of ice slowly melts away under the hot sun, while Baxter and Westcott swelter on the front porch. The delay finally becomes unbearable and Baxter decides to investigate. He reaches the rear porch just as Roy is about to kiss Betty. He orders Betty into the house, and turns on Roy, and indignantly orders him off. Baxter rejoins Westcott on the front porch where they discuss the impudent iceman, while Ellen, the cook, serves them a warm drink containing the little piece of ice Roy has left. Roy cannot understand Baxter's action. Thoroughly angry, he determines to go back and get Betty and elope with her. He finds her in the kitchen, and she consents to go. Just as they are leaving, Ellen tells Baxter and Westcott that the iceman has stolen Betty. Roy places Betty in the ice wagon and drives off. The pursuers are being distanced when the help of a passing automobile enables them to overtake the fugitives. Betty sits on the back steps of the wagon and weeps while Baxter heaps abuse on Roy. Westcott discovers the identity of the iceman, and taking exception to Baxter's language, indignantly asks if his son is not good enough for Baxter's maid. Baxter reports that Betty is his daughter. Baxter and Westcott are not averse to such an alliance, they see the humor of the situation, and everyone is satisfied.

THE PHYSICIAN OF SILVER GULCH (Oct. 3).—Dr. Ralph Jones settled in Silver Basin, and built up a practice. Everything went well until his practice fell off badly. One day Royce, the sheriff, called Jones to attend his child. That same day he received a message to guard the payroll of gold for the Bonanza Claim Mining Co. Royce goes to attend to his duty and Jones returns to his office. He finds himself short of cash. Thinking of the large shipment of gold, he is seized with the desire to steal it, and yields to the temptation. He steals through the bank window, and tries to open the door of the room where the gold is stored, only to find his hand seized from the other side. Not knowing who was in the other room, he endeavors to pull his hand out of the hole in the door, but in vain, as the sheriff has it tied to the door latch. While tying the hand the sheriff receives a phone call from his wife, telling him to hurry with the doctor as the baby is very ill again. With a supreme effort, Jones manages to release his hand, but not in time to escape a shot fired by the sheriff. Jones escapes and the sheriff endeavors to follow the robber, but finds that the outer cross bar has been securely fastened. He finally manages to release it, but too late to see or catch his man. A posse is organized and start on the hunt. Royce rushes to the doctor's house. Jones is tempted to run away, but decides to brave it out. Quickly covering his wounded hand with a glove, he opens the door. The sheriff rushes in and Jones is summoned to attend the child. The men go together and soon reached the house. The child passes the critical point. The physician has done his work and in an effort to thank him, the wife grasps the wounded hand. The sheriff hears the cry of pain and learns that a guilty man stands before him. The doctor admits his guilt, but the wife pleads with her husband not to arrest him. Considering that he saved the life of the child he permits the doctor to go.

SPOONY SAM (Oct. 4).—Spoony Sam and Sis Perkins think they are in love with each other. Sam is too spoony in his courtship to suit old man Perkins. Sam has a hated rival in the person of Cy Hawkins. Sam takes a desperate chance and buys a ring, engages the parson and boldly presents himself to old man Perkins, as a prospective son-in-law. The old man is furious at first, but finally weakens. Just as the parson is about to perform the ceremony, Sam runs away. Just then Cy Hawkins happens along and wants to know what the excitement is. He is informed that Sam and Sis were about to be married when Sam got cold feet and ran away. Cy tells the old man that there is no danger of him getting cold feet if placed in the same position. The parson starts to marry them when they discover that they have no ring. Just then Sam returns. Old man Perkins takes the ring away from Sam, and informs him that the best he will get is that Cy will marry Sis with his (Sam's) ring. In order that the ceremony may continue peacefully, old man Perkins is compelled to hold Spoony Sam's head in a bucket of water.

COLLECTION DAY (Oct. 4).—Julis Shutz, a shoemaker, who has an Irish wife, were living happily until business became dull and their credit at the various stores stopped and the creditors began assembling to collect back bills. Shutz and his wife see the landlord coming. Shutz hits upon the idea; his wife lies in bed critically ill and he attempts to hang himself on the chandelier. The scheme works wonders, for the landlord gives them money and promises more aid. They see the grocer approaching for his bill. This time Mrs. Shutz insists upon her husband playing ill, and tries the rope stunt herself, which proves more successful than the last, for the good hearted grocer leaves ten dollars with the starving couple. When the newsboy tries to collect his money for papers and is thrown out of the window by the Shutzs. He meets the landlord and tells him of the escapade. They immediately see through the Shutz's scheme and return for satisfaction. They discover that the Schutzs are missing, and give chase. After several exciting incidents and with two policemen, the delinquents are captured, brought before a magistrate, but said magistrate being unable to attend through sickness, hurriedly sends a friend whose knowledge of law is limited, and on seeing prisoners before him, recognizes Mrs Shutz as an old school friend. He forgets law and starts a little reminiscence of their school days. The police finally inform him that this is a court of law. He becomes angry and dismisses the whole court and resumes his school chat.

HIS LIFE (Oct. 5).—The man leaves home in the country to seek his fortune in the city. He tells his mother he will work for her and come back rich. After kissing his mother and sweetheart goodbye, he tells the latter to look after his mother. In later years he has gained success and fortune, but has forgotten his promises. He is leading a life of dissipation. The old mother sits at home dreaming of her boy and the sweetheart decides to write, telling him he is breaking his mother's heart by neglect. The man receives the letter in the midst of one of his gay parties, and destroys it. A scrub woman who cleans his office is discharged by the janitor because she caught him drinking. She goes to the man while he is in the midst of a fancy dress ball, and after some trouble the butler tells him a woman wants to see him. He leaves the woman he is dancing with, and goes to see the scrub woman. She tells him her troubles, and while he is handing her some money he sees her old work worn hands, which remind him of his mother. He rushes back into the ball room and denounces all his so-called friends who try to stop him. He rushes to his dressing room, changes his clothes, calls his machine and drives rapidly to the depot, where he takes a train to the old home. The mother and sweetheart receive him with open arms and the man begins a new life.

MELIES.

FORGIVE US OUR TRESPASSES (Oct. 10).—John Benson and his sister Mary are surprised one morning in learning that they have new neighbors in Mr. Gray and his son, Danny. Danny is taught to say the Lord's prayer every night and to practice its principles in his daily life. In his play one day, Danny is hurt and the father, in distraction, calls upon Mary for aid. She gives the care that only a woman can give to a sick person, and the acquaintance commences, so that later, when Mr. Gray is seriously injured at the stone works, she nurses him back to health. It is plain to be seen that Mr. Gray is beginning to evince more than admiration for his pretty neighbor. Mary takes Danny to town on the day that a theatrical troupe arrives and one of the actresses recognizes in the lad her little son. She tells Mary and is taken to Mr. Gray's house, but he will not receive her, because shortly after Danny's birth she left his home and went astray. Danny is soon taught by Mary to love his mother, but the kind neighbor is not equally successful with the father. Finally Danny brings about an unexpected meeting between father and mother, and, on bended knee repeats the prayer his daddy had so often taught him: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive . . ." The father touched by these words from his son, repents his sternness and receives his wife once more unto their home.

BIOGRAPH.

SO NEAR, YET SO FAR (Sept. 30).—The world may love the lover, but it often tantalizingly throws obstacles in his way. Howard saw the girl and was transfixed with admiration for her. Being of a backward nature, he misses the opportunity to be introduced. The girl is amused at his embarrassment, and when in his fluster he drops his fraternity pin, she picks it up, unobserved by him, and keeps it as a souvenir of their first near-meeting. On several other occasions he almost succeeds in being introduced to her, but always when he is nearest the goal of his desire he is hurled into the depths of despair. Still he persists, until finally his perseverance is rewarded through a most unique trick of fate.

A FEUD IN THE KENTUCKY HILLS (Oct. 3).—The two brothers and the little adopted daughter of the household grew up from childhood together. The girl and the younger brother were childhood sweethearts, he being so different in nature from his elder brother, who was considered the bad man and dead shot of the hills. The younger brother has been living in the valley for a long time and returns to his home at the time the story opens. He is quite a contrast to his elder brother, in fact to the whole family—refined, educated, and, of course, a revelation to the little girl, who, though betrothed to the elder brother, is strongly attracted by him. Hence there is a renewal of childhood affection. This the elder brother ferociously objects to, making it understood that the girl is engaged to him, so the younger boy, for the sake of peace, decides to leave the place. However, fate decrees it otherwise, for an old feud is reawakened and he joins his brother to fight the common enemy. This incident reverses conditions.

BREAD UPON THE WATERS (Sept. 30).—Tim Clancy, an ex-convict, on the day of his release, returns home and is welcomed by his mother and sweetheart. He decides to turn over a new leaf. He applies and secures work at the Ganes shoe factory. Here he is recognized by a detective and when his record is made known to the management he is discharged. The inevitable follows. Tim spends many weary weeks searching for work, but is rebuffed at every turn through the efforts of his nemisis, the detective. Finally he is forced to beg. He appears at the Preston home and asks for bread. Mrs. Preston gives him a loaf of bread she has just baked. After his departure, Mrs. Preston discovers the loss of one of her rings. Tim returns home with the bread and finds the ring inside the loaf. His mother prevails upon him to return the ring, and Tim starts for the Preston home. Arriving at the Preston's he is recognized as an ex-convict and before he has a chance to explain, the dog is set upon him. He flees, but is later captured and taken prisoner. He tells his story of finding the ring and when it is verified by Mrs. Preston, Tim is finally offered his old job in the shoe factory.

WHY JIM REFORMED (Oct. 1).—After a shopping trip to town one day an habitual drinker succumbs to the temptation of taking one drink at the roadhouse on the way home. The one drink develops into a great many and some hours later he awakens from a drunken stupor to find an empty flask and a revolver lying beside him on the grass. He cannot account for the gun until he discovers his friend, lying near him, dead. On his own hands he discovers blood stains. As everything seems to prove conclusively that he has committed the crime, Jim decides to give himself up to justice. He, therefore, goes to the sheriff to surrender himself. The sheriff meantime has learned that Jim's friend was accidentally killed by a wolf trap that had discharged a load of buckshot into his back. Jim is released, but this harrowing experience serves to teach him a very bitter lesson. Listening now to the pleadings of his wife, he quickly reforms.

THE PIRATE'S DAUGHTER (Oct. 2).—Old Dirago, a pirate who harried the coast of California in the early part of the last century, had a daughter of whom he was passionately fond. For her sake he was on his last voyage of collecting treasure, and was about to leave his wild life of buccaneering on the high seas. He took his daughter aboard, thinking she would not discover his method of life, but her keen instinct detected the truth, and she berated him for exposing her to the risk of being insulted by gross and brutal men. In one instance, at least, her instinct was right. The mate, Vargas, taking advantage of the captain's absence ashore, came to her cabin door, and when the captain returned and caught him, he lashed Vargas to the mast and subjected him to the tortures of the whip and thirst. In going ashore to a secret cove to bury his treasure in a safer place, the old pirate was seen by a vigilant coast guard and followed. In the fight that ensued he and his men were killed and Almita saw her father's fate from the deck. The three remaining guards rowed to the ship, where the pirates were drinking and fighting, and two were killed by some of the less intoxicated, at the direction of Almita. The third guard rowed away, but in their orgy the pirates had upset a lamp and the ship caught fire. Seeing a woman aboard the guard rowed back, but the frenzied ruffians, who had jumped over the side, seized the guard's boat, and he was compelled to swim to her aid. He succeeded in bringing her ashore, and the next day having buried her father, they took the treasure to the padre of the nearby mission. Almita told the padre it was to be used for the poor of his church, for she felt she could not touch it. And as he had saved her life, she gave it and her love to the brave man who had made her an orphan in the performance of his duty.

THE GREAT DROUGHT (Oct. 3).—Jim Harker is a landlord of the cruelest type. Harker evicts the Widow Cline and her son Andy from the house which he owns because they cannot pay the rent. The community is so aroused by Harker's action that his own family is ostracised. Finally he is driven out of town entirely, and moves to the Far West to try ranching.

In the meantime, neighbors provide a purse to send the Clines west. It chances that the Harkers and the Clines take up land in neighboring valleys, without knowing the presence of the others. Harker goes in for ranching on a large scale. His funds are low, but he pledges his crops in payment for the installments on the land, which is held by a brutal fellow named Dominguez. An old squaw appeals to Harker for food. He uses his usual brutal measures on her, and she utters against him a terrible curse:—"The drought be upon you." True, a terrible drought visits the region that season. Dominguez sees how things are going and calls for a pledge for the coming season. Dominguez has conceived a passion for Helen, but Helen loathes him. Dominguez proposes to Harker that he yield him his daughter in marriage if by the seventh day from date no rain has fallen. The father signs a document to this effect. The seventh day approaches without rain. Jim Harker is finally brought to his knees by his agony of mind, and goes out into the parched fields, falls on his knees and prays with tragic eloquence for rain. As Jim Harker prays, the clouds roll in, and rain falls on his upturned face. In the meantime, the Cines have struck water and prospered. On this day when the rain falls, Helen Harker mounts her pony and goes in desperation to bring help for her little brother, who lies stricken with fever. She has heard of the neighboring ranch and rides that way. She comes face to face with Andy Cline. The Clines come to her assistance, and Harker now abjectly asks the Widow Cline's forgiveness for the terrible wrong he had done her. Dominguez, hurrying toward Harker's ranch on the last day of grace to claim Helen, is overtaken by the rain. With the philosophy of the gambler he tears up the pledge signed by Harker and returns to town.

AN ASSISTED ELOPEMENT (Oct. 4).—Tom Richmond, who is spending his vacation at the beach, is rescued from drowning by a yachting party. Wilson's daughter Jane is aboard. The acquaintance soon ripens into love and Tom gets her promise to marry him, on the condition that he obtains her father's consent. Tom, who is poor, starts in with her father by telling him he is "in love with a girl worth a million." Wilson, not knowing it is his daughter, plans an elopement.

He lends Tom his auto, gives him passage to Honolulu as a wedding present, and lends him money for expenses. The elopement comes off as planned, but is almost spoiled by Tom sending an explanatory message to Wilson, before he has obtained his marriage license. Wilson arrives at the dock a few minutes after the vessel has left, and immediately chases it in a motor boat. He has given orders to the captain of his steamer that he is "to obey Tom's orders until he (Wilson), countermands them."

When he gets near the vessel Tom ties the whistle open so the captain can't hear Wilson's orders to

PATHE.

AT THE BURGLAR'S COMMAND (Oct. 2).—"Midnight Bill," entering a fashionable house for the purpose of pursuing his illegitimate trade, comes upon Gwendoline Smith with a pistol in her hand contemplating suicide because of a lover's quarrel. He forces her, at the pistol point, to call her lover, Philip Sawyer, on the 'phone and ask him to come to the house. He next summons a minister and acts as a witness to the ceremony. Too, he supplies a wedding ring from the loot he carries. When the couple embrace, at his command, they forget their differences and "Midnight Bill" withdraws, well satisfied that he has done at least one good turn in his life.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT (Oct. 3).—With Sagamore Hill as a background, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt was the target for our camera during one entire day. The cameraman followed him through the day's various activities, which began with a ride on his favorite horse, included an interview with a newspaper man, the answering of the morning mail and later, the more strenuous exercise of chopping down a tree. This picture gives one an intimate acquaintance with a man who loves the open country, and who, although perhaps the busiest man in the land, still finds time to exercise sufficiently to keep himself in superb physical condition.

A REDMAN'S LOYALTY (Oct. 5).—Bull Moose, an Indian guide, is accompanying Mrs. Hawkins and her little daughter, who are traveling west to join Dan Hawkins, over the Broken Trail. Crossing the Arizona desert the little party is attacked by a band of savages and forced to flee. The strain of the chase and the lack of water soon tell on Mrs. Hawkins and in the midst of the wild desert she passes away. As the Indians are crowding him, Bull Moose directs the girl to ride straight ahead. He staggers after her for a few paces and then drops exhausted in the sand. In the meantime, Hawkins, uneasy when his little family fails to arrive on time, suspects Bull Moose of killing them for the gold they carried. He gathers a few friends and they start a search for the party. Hawkins finds the Indian stretched out in the sand. There is no trace of his wife and child and Hawkins is with difficulty restrained from killing the Indian. One of his friends finds the little girl riding aimlessly about and brings her to Hawkins. She explains the manner of her mother's death and as Bull Moose breathes his last, she offers a prayer for a brave and loyal soul.

A WELL-WASHED HOUSE (Oct. 1).—Two mischievous children steal the gardener's hose, turn on the water and begin washing a house. When the outside is clean they turn their attention to cleaning the inside and the results prove that this mirth provoker is a winner.

THE EVOLUTION AND LIFE OF A SILK WORM (Oct. 1).—A little worm which weaves the finest fabric known. The manner in which it does its work is clearly set forth by means of excellent photography and beautiful coloring.

A SHIP BOY'S GRIT (Oct. 4).—Little Franz Lender, an orphan, ships on an unseaworthy schooner. While the captain and the mate are in a stupor from liquor, the vessel springs a leak and the boy, with his hand and arm, keeps the water out all through the long night. When morning comes the captain and mate find him unconscious. Realizing the boy's bravery, they resolve to be better men and volunteer to act as the lad's protectors.

CALUMET "K" (Sept. 30).—Calumet "K" is a grain elevator in course of construction just outside of Chicago. The railroad fails to deliver lumber, there are mutterings of labor trouble, and altogether the man in charge is making but little progress. Therefore the contractors send a young man named Charles Bannon to finish up the job. Bannon finds things in pretty bad shape, and he gets the lumber delivered by a lake schooner.

Next the labor troubles manifest themselves. There is a walking delegate who is out for graft and upon Bannon's refusal to "come across," he starts a strike. Bannon, in his straightforward way, lays the whole case before the president of the labor union, who is a broad minded man and who starts an investigation. Suffice it to say that Bannon finishes the job on time, and receives the congratulations of his men.

THE GIRL FROM THE COUNTRY (Oct. 1).—Nellie is preparing herself for a stenographer's position by diligent study in her home town. As her proficiency increases she begins to hear the call of the city—and when Jennie, an old school chum, comes home from the city on a visit, she learns that it is easy to secure a position in the city and wins her mother's consent to go with her. Her sweetheart, Tom, a pigeon farmer, realizes that Jennie is not the kind of a girl she was before she left the old town, but forebears to speak of it even when Nellie refuses to marry him. He believes in Nellie and her ability to stand the test of the crucible. He is willing to wait.

Nellie's slender purse permits of only a hall-room on the top floor of a typical city rooming house. One night, having accepted an invitation to supper with two of Jennie's men friends she realizes the truth and understands Jennie's easy life. The horror of it appals her and she flees to the little hall room to think. She has lost her position because of the unwelcome attentions of her employer. Her funds are getting low and the future is dark.

In the meantime no word from Nellie has reached home for some period and Tom fearing that she is in trouble, has expressed her his favorite homing pigeon. It arrives in the darkest hour of her trials. Dear old Tom! She understands. Swiftwing is intended as her messenger to him if she needs help. A moment decides her and Swiftwing takes the air with a bit of ribbon as her message to Tom. Tom's timely arrival prevents Nellie being dispossessed by a brutal landlord.

OLYMPIC GAMES, PITTSBURGH Y. M. C. A. (Oct. 2).—Everybody likes to see athletic games and here we witness an exhibition of them which is every bit as good as being on the ground themselves. These games are held by the Y. M. C. A. of Pittsburgh, and are remarkable for the great number of nationalities represented among the contestants. Races, discus throwing, calisthenics, pole vaulting—all are interesting and some are sensational.

THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER (Oct. 2).—Two hungry tramps approach the rear of Mrs. Weston's house with the intention of begging for food. They overhear a spirited war of words between Mr. and Mrs. Weston, who appear to be insanely jealous of each other, and when the eavesdropping tramps appear on the threshold they are promptly kicked out.

This treatment so angers the tramps that they decide on a plan to get even and procure a square meal too. Accordingly they write an anonymous letter to Mr. Weston telling him of his wife's infatuation for a portrait artist, in whose studio she can be found at twelve o'clock. Mrs. Weston also receives an anonymous letter stating that her husband has an appointment in a dressmaker's establishment at the same hour.

The green-eyed monster is so firmly imbedded in this loving couple that they take this bait beautifully and are promptly on hand at the places indicated in the letters, with the result that the misinformed couple become entangled in some unexpected complications making them ridiculous and highly amusing to the spectator. Thoroughly disgusted, but still suspicious, they rush for home, where they both meet at the front door and demand to know where the other has been.

Still quarreling they enter the house, where they find the kitchen in great disorder, the refrigerator and larder having been robbed of every morsel of food, with the following note from the tramps: "Sorry to have caused any hard feeling between you but we needed a square meal. Kiss and make up. Weary and Pal. P. S. The pie was sure bum." They now see their folly and take the tramps' advice.

CASHMERE (Oct. 4).—Of all India, Cashmere excels in beauty and in antiquity. This picture tells the story in superb photography, bringing us under the Oriental skies, where cascades plunge hundreds of feet. Aside from the sumptuous settings of nature, are the homes and every-day contrivances of the people which are bound to open the eye with wonderment. One scene in particular, a bridge built of three ropes, over which natives draw themselves like spiders on a strand of silky web.

The arrival of the Maharajah from his winter sojourn in the plains, was taken at the landing-place and affords an exceptional view. The industrial activities of the people are the same as others in the Orient, slow and plodding, weaving, spinning and wood-carving being the chief occupations, of which they are masters.

THE USURER'S GRIP (Oct. 5).—A young clerk, a small salary, a wife and child, the child long ill—then the doctor's bill and other bills and debts accumulate—the advertisement in the newspaper about borrowing money on your furniture at six per cent.—Ah! That's the solution. I'll try it! Yes, he tried it and as the picture unfolds itself we see the clerk careworn and desperate borrowing twenty-five dollars from a loan shark, who compels him to return five of it for drawing up papers. At this the clerk remonstrates and shows the loan shark his own advertisement at six per cent. The shark snarls and snatches back the money—but the child is ill—what can he do but submit and take what he gets and sign that fatal card, which reads that he must pay forty-five dollars for the loan of twenty-five. He signs it—he has to.

Now comes with sickening regularity the dreaded monthly payments. He cannot always meet them—what then? Slowly they go, his watch, her brooch and last, the baby's ring.

And next comes the "bawler-out." The clerk at his desk in a large office is told that a woman wishes to see him. She demands a payment—he can't comply—she raises her voice, threatens, heaps imprecations on him—she will not be silenced. The clerk is humiliated before the whole office and the manager discharges him. He plods home and breaks the news to his wife, who comforts him and bids him try again.

The clerk succeeds in getting a new position and a kindly, sympathetic employer in whom he confides, when the "bawler-out" next appears. His employer takes him to a loan association, where anyone who is employed and in distress may borrow money at the legal rate of interest. Again, through his employer, the clerk meets the district attorney and tells him of the loan shark who is squeezing money from him, although he has already more than paid the debt. The district attorney investigates and intervenes just in time to prevent the ruffian from taking the very bed from under the clerk's sick child. He also compels him to give back all the usury interest he has received above six per cent.

ROSE OF THE ISLANDS (Sept. 23).—Jean Pichaud and Peter Brent, a boatman, are rivals for the hand of Rose—daughter of Ferrault, a fisherman. Jean wins her love. Jean, being a gambler, cajoles Rose into giving him a few coins from Ferrault's "stocking." Having found out where Ferrault keeps his savings, he returns in Rose's absence to steal the "stocking." He is caught at it by Brent, who, hearing Rose coming home, hides Jean in a cupboard, to save the girl from knowing her lover is a thief. Rose, seeing the torn plank on the floor, suspects Brent of the theft. Ferrault comes in and calls for rum from the cupboard. Rose, about to fetch it, is stopped by Brent. Truth dawns on her and Ferrault, impatient, throws open the cupboard himself. Jean is revealed. He points to Brent and accuses him of taking the stocking. The stocking, being found in Brent's bosom, where he had hastily thrust it, suspicion falls on him. Brent walks under a ban. Rose transfers her love to him. Brent, unknowingly, fearing lest the scorn of the community goad him to a true confession, decides to leave the island. Meanwhile, urged by Jean, Ferrault insists that Rose shall marry Jean at once. At bay, she determines to flee with Brent. She hides in his boat on the night of his departure. Brent in midsea is confronted by Rose, who confesses her love for him.

AMBROSIO.

ARABIAN INFAMY (Sept. 25).—An Arabian chief falls wildly in love with the French Consul's wife, and having been refused by her he steals her daughter. The mother, after a long search, finds her daughter in a disused cottage. The joy of the mother is of short duration—two lions attracted by the presence of living people, scratch at the door of the cottage and try to enter. The door does not long resist the pressure and is broken down by the lions. The moment is terrible, but the woman sees a way of salvation. In the middle of the room is a very deep hole in which a quantity of arms is hidden by the Arabians preparatory to a rebellion. The lions bounding into the room fall into the hole as the woman had hoped. The mother and child are saved—saved from the Arabian—saved from the lions.

THE SHERIFF'S REWARD (Sept. 24).—The sheriff of Oklapola County is in love with Nell, and Nell has not only won the heart of the sheriff but also the fondness of his mother. Pasquale, a Mexican, and his band of outlaws are camping near Nell's home. Nell's father receives a check for $8,000. Pasquale sees this and goes at once to inform the bandits. It so transpires that the bandits have selected this very day for their robbery. Nell and her father are alone on the ranch and the father, seeing the bandits approaching, starts to defend himself, but is soon shot and falls to the floor wounded. They rush into the house, seize Nell, who has gone after the money, takes her captive, set fire to the house and dash away. The father finally revives, staggers to the stable, and rides to the village store. The cowboys meet him. He explains everything, and the sheriff's mother takes him into the house to wash his wounds. The sheriff and the boys are soon on the trail of the bandits, and they finally succeed in capturing them. Nell is rescued and the sheriff takes her to his home. A few weeks later, the sheriff receives for his reward a check for $2,000 from the governor of the State for ridding the community of the band of outlaws, which he turns over to the mother of two boys killed in the fight. His greater reward is the hand of his sweetheart Nell in marriage.

AT OLD FORT DEARBORN (Sept. 28).—One day, in the spring of 1812, Black Partridge, a friendly Pottawatomie chief, appeared before Captain N. Heald, the commander of the garrison at Fort Dearborn, which occupied the site of the city of Chicago previously to 1812. Singing Bird, a squaw, accompanied her father. Black Partridge handed back the famous "Peace Medal" to Commander Heald, telling him that the Indians were on the war path and beyond control. Rawlins, a dissolute Englishman, insulted Singing Bird, and was confined in the guard house, from which he escaped. He joined the Indians and incited them to attack and destroy the garrison and settlers. Captain Heald received a message, brought by a friendly Indian, from General Hull, telling him that Mackinaw had fallen and instructing him to evacuate the garrison and distribute the United States lands amongst the Indians. Rawlins plotted with the Indians to offer safe conduct to the whites at Fort Wayne. Heald deemed it policy to accept the offer, and the garrison and a handful of settlers evacuated and marched out. The attitude of the Indians was unmistakable and the band played the "Dead March in Saul." The attack was made, and with few exceptions the brave band was murdered. Captain Heald was overpowered and Mrs. Heald, standing bravely by her husband's side, was seized by Crouching Cat and was about to be captured when Singing Bird killed the Indian with a tomahawk. Rawlins endeavored to take her off, but Singing Bird pulled Mrs. Heald, badly wounded, upon her horse, and escaped with her.

Rawlins had Heald tied to a tree, having saved him in order to torture him. Singing Bird drugged the guard's water, and freed Heald and helped him to escape. The brave Indian girl was badly wounded and died in Mrs. Heald's arms as a detachment of soldiers from Fort Wayne rode up to complete the rescue. The Indians burned the fort and celebrated their victory.

THE OLD ORGANIST (Sept. 26).—Mary and her old father, the village organist, live by themselves. A stranger, Deering, appears in the little community, and falls in love with the country girl. He asks her hand in marriage, but the old organist, asks for a day's consideration. On entering his church for the evening service, he discovers Deering in an intoxicated condition, and tells his daughter. Deering is a noted New York crook who has selected this village for a temporary retirement from his scenes of lawlessness. Deering entices Mary to elope with him and she consents. They go to New York and Deering joins his old pals and Mary becomes the victim of his brutality. At length Deering throws his unfortunate wife out of the miserable home, and the poor girl determines to return to the village. In the meantime Deering and his pals have a falling out, and Deering is killed. The old organist is about to start for the city in search of his child, when overcome by his unwonted exertions, he dies peacefully in the old seat where he courted Mary's mother. Mary returns to find her old father at last at peace.

THE HIDDEN BONDS (Sept. 29).—Ruth Adams, the ward of a wealthy stock broker, refuses an offer of marriage from a well known and successful banker, who is a close friend of her guardian. She is in love with Tom Wright, an employee in the office of her guardian, the stock broker. Her guardian wishes to win her for himself, and is jealous of the young man. He conceives a plan to ruin the young fellow's career by altering his books and hiding some securities of which the young clerk is custodian. He then calls the young man in and accuses him of embezzlement. The poor fellow is taken away by an officer of the law. The girl, believing her sweetheart innocent, goes to see him. He tells her that he believes her guardian was the perpetrator of this dastardly act in order to put him, Tom, out of the way. She then calls upon the banker and persuades him to aid them in their difficulty. He promises his aid and asks for his reward her hand in marriage; owing to her great and unselfish love for Tom she consents. The banker by forcing up the stock market finally succeeds in compelling the broker, as a last resort, to use the hidden bonds, thus clearing Tom. When confronted with the "hidden bonds" the broker confesses. The banker then reminds Ruth of her promise, but at the last moment he releases her from her promise and joins hands of Ruth and Tom to their great relief and unbounding joy.

POWERS.

THE PLAN THAT FAILED (Sept. 25).—Matty wants to be a cowboy and hence, on Monday morning, his mother's snowy white wash is thrown on the ground so that Matty can use the rope as a lariat. He gets spanked. Early sees daddy working on a new bench and without any intention of doing any harm, she tries to assist by hammering a few nails into one of the sections. Matty wants to be a father also and he sees that the nails protrude inside of the board, so he takes a plane and tries to level them off. When he is discovered, they both get a spanking.

After a few more spankings Early gets an inspiration and places into the seat of Matty's trousers a little board and Matty does likewise for Early. They then tie ribbons on Polly, which belongs to a maiden aunt. Surprise and mortification when aunty does not spank them where the boards have been put, but chastises the hand instead.

SWAT THE FLY (Sept. 25).—This subject shows the life of the fly from birth up to the time that millions of them are killed by the children working for prizes which are being offered by the various city governments throughout the State.

HER AMBITION (Sept. 27).—Fritzi becomes acquainted with a young doctor and invites him to call at her home. The doctor is introduced by her to an older sister who is ambitious to have the good things of life and realizes if she can catch the doctor he will be able to furnish her with all the luxuries. She sets her cap for him and eventually he proposes and is accepted. Florence immediately makes her debut in society. Finally to continue to furnish her with money he speculates in the stock market. His fortune ebbs faster than ever before and eventually he is a ruined man. His wife comes upon the scene as Fritzi is sympathizing with him and discovers him with one arm apparently around the neck of Fritzi, but only patting her on the back and thanking her for her condolences. In the meantime all of the society friends, of course, discard the wife who is now only the wife of a poor physician. Realizing that all is not gold that glitters and that her husband's love is more to her than all else, she tears the jewels from her bodice and the rings from her fingers, and contentedly walks in and lays them before her discouraged husband and tells him to try and use them as he sees fit as all she wants is his love.

GETTING MARY MARRIED (Sept. 23).—Father and mother are much pleased to see Peter, a well to do young man, making love to Mary, their daughter, but father on learning from his wife that he will have to stand the expense of $1,250, for the wedding, decides that by withholding his consent his daughter and Peter would elope and save him the $1,250. Mother gives her consent, but father refuses. He sends Peter on his way and locks Mary in her room and hustles to the City Hall to procure a marriage license for the couple. Finding Peter bewailing his fate, he manages to place the license where he finds it. How it came to be filled out in his and Mary's names is to him a mystery, but he decides to avail himself of the opportunity. The father procures the ladder so his daughter can escape from her room, furnishes the machine to accelerate their getting to the minister's, fixes the machine when it breaks down, and when they are disheartened and about to give up at not being able to rouse the deaf minister to whose house they have gone, the father manages to enter the house, awakens the minister and has the triple satisfaction of seeing the loving pair united in the holy bonds of matrimony, and of giving them his parental blessing and the knowledge that his elopement scheme turned out a wonderful success. So this is how father saved $1,250.

ECLAIR.

THE OLD DOCTOR'S HUMANITY (Oct. 1).—A young doctor arrives at a country town and hangs out his shingle. The old village doctor bids him welcome, saying, "There is room enough for both of us." But the village is skeptical of the newcomer's ability. Through the old doctor he meets the village banker's daughter, whish later brings him his first case, for when her little brother is ill, she persuades her father to send for the young doctor. He makes a mistake in writing the perscription which the village druggist detects and then proceeds to tell all the villagers about.

He cures a village cripple by way of proving his ability, but none will give him credit or compliment except the old doctor. Then an epidemic of typhoid breaks out. The old doctor is receiving more calls than he can attend to and recommends the young fellow. But all refuse to have him. The older one's wife and daughter are stricken down and he sends for the younger to attend them.

The epidemic passes, the old doctor has lost several of his patients, while the younger one brings the other's wife and daughter through to a splendid recovery. Overworked, the old doctor collapses and takes to his bed.

The villagers, not knowing that the young doctor has taken care of the elder's family, conclude that their own sick has been neglected while the old doctor spent his time upon his own family. So they come to him, bearing a letter of denunciation that he should allow their loved ones to die while he saved his own.

The committee arrives just as the young doctor is bringing his beloved old friend across the crisis. And so they see, and learn, and in the sorrow of shame, they turn and leave.

THE LUCKY LOSER (Oct. 3).—Lily Worthing receives three proposals from three eligible suitors. But Lily loves to play the kitten, craves attention and protestations, she refuses all that they will try again. Mother had seen the dejected expressions of the three young men, so she walks in on Lily's reverie of conquest and broken hearts, and rudely awakened her gloriful dream with the ultimatum, that she, Lily Worthing, make up her mind to accept one of these three young men or go back to boarding school.

Lily called the three lovers together, and tells them that they are to race to Boston, there to find a bride waiting for the winner. All secure saddle horses, and Lily gives the word to "go," and herself starts off in the auto and soon passes them. She gets to the designated hotel and awaits the arrival of the husband-to-be.

Lily, however, loves Will Ross the best of the trio and rather instinctively the other two feel it. So before the start is made, the pair had tampered with Will's cinch strap. Nearing the end of the race, the cinch breaks and Will falls and badly sprains his ankle. A farmer picks him up and Will has him send a wire to Lily, telling of his accident.

Lily receives the message and hurries to his resting-place, and there promises to marry him.

Remembering the other two contestants, who will be waiting for her at the hotel, she hurries back just as they arrive. She secures an old colored woman and as the pair each come to claim their bride, presents them to Topsy as the bride she had meant them to have. Will recovers and takes Lily back to her mother as his wife.

THE LOCK OF HAIR (Oct. 6).—Away to war and sweethearts must part. John and Fair Franchon have said over and over again those many little things which lovers always tell. As John is leaving, Franchon gives him a lock of hair with the wish and hope that it will protect him should danger come.

John is away to war now. There are soldiers out on a forage. They enter a humble little home and soon come out with some meager little parcels of food, while plainly can be heard the pleas of the one inside not to take his all. But the soldiers laugh and a profane answer is all that is made. Now John comes in sight and enters this same home and learns of the sickness and need which the foraging soldiers had taken from.

He returns to camp and denounces the meanness of those who stole from the helpless. A quarrel ensues and blows are struck. John falls and is dying when he begs the now conscience-stricken soldier to take the lock of hair to his Fair Franchon.

THE LEGEND OF MONTMARTRE (Sept. 17).—The Governor's daughter has many suitors. She tells them all that the one who brings her a branch from the Indian's sacred tree at the top of Montmartre shall win her hand. Two of the suitors accept the challenge and start out. Both arrive at the mount at the same time. A duel takes place between them and the defeated suitor apparently leaves for home, but realizing that the captain will win the hand of the girl, he plots with the Indians to do away with him for having dared to touch the tree which they think is sacred.

The Indians come upon the captain as he descends the tree with the precious branch and invite him to a feast. In the meantime several of the savages have loosened the roof of the cave and as the captain enters, the top caves in. The captain's life is spared, but he loses his eyesight forever. He becomes the charge of the superstitious Indians and is given to a squaw, who is instructed to take care of him.

Months afterward, the blind captain tells his faithful guard of his lost love and why he risked his life to climb their sacred tree. In the meantime, the Governor's daughter, believing the captain dead, consents to marry his rival, who has claimed that he was wounded while endeavoring to reach the tree and carried back the tale that the captain was killed. The Indian girl, after hearing the captain's story, yields to his entreaties to help him escape, and at arriving at the Governor's house they learn that the ceremony is about to take place in the chapel. As the Indian girl leads the blind captain into the church, the priest who is about to pronounce the rival and the Governor's daughter man and wife, is stopped by the cries of the captain. He tells his story and the Indian girl also tells the plot of the rival. The rival rushes from the church and the Governor's daughter, realizing the great wrong which she has done the captain, falls on her knees to ask forgiveness, which is readily given and the captain leads her to the altar and the ceremony is continued.

THE ADVENT OF JANE (Sept. 27).—To a moonshine district in the mountains comes Jane A. Bixby, M. D. The advent of Jane causes considerable comment among the inhabitants of the locality, who without exception laugh at the very idea of "a woman doctor." But the majority of the men admire her charms, especially one Bill Jenkins, who plans to form her acquaintance. Joe Buford is also one who ridicules Jane's claims to medical ability. He has a little sister who is taken suddenly and seriously ill and all home remedies failing he is compelled to carry her to Jane. Jane treats the little girl's case wisely and quickly and she is soon on the short road to recovery. Jane makes a wonderful impression upon Buford and, when he discovers Bill Jenkins trying to form her acquaintance by a pretense of an injured hand, he rescues her from his unwelcome attentions. Later feeling under great obligations to Jane, he presents her with a jug of moonshine whiskey made in his own still. The newly appointed U. S. Marshal, Calvin Doane, comes to Jane's office and in a joking manner points to the jug of whiskey and then discovers it to be the product of an illicit still. He immediately starts out with his deputies to arrest Buford and destroy the still.

Buford jumps down the side of a cliff and swims a river in his attempt to escape and finally arrives at Jane's office with a broken arm. Just as Jane has completed dressing his arm, Doane arrives and Jane conceals Buford. The latter, however, is very bitter over being hounded by Doane and comes out from his hiding place with the intention of killing Doane. Jane then makes him give up his revolver. Doane then starts to place the handcuffs on Buford, but Jane finally persuades him to allow Buford one more chance. Doane then leaves and Buford tells Jane that for her sake he will give up his lawless life and become a better man.

NESTOR.

CARL VAN GORDON'S FAMILY (Sept. 23).—Dorothy Langdon becomes engaged to Carl Van Gordon and receives an anonymous letter saying that Carl is married and has a family. She laughs at the idea.

At the same time Carl receives word that his cousin, Marie, is in town, her husband being ill in a hospital. He calls, and finding Marie and her five small children just starting for the park, accompanies them. On the way Marie runs into the hospital for a moment. Carl goes on to the park with the children, and a trained nurse brings word that Marie's husband is worse and that Carl will have to amuse the children. She also brings a nursing bottle for the baby.

Carl is aghast. He knows nothing about the children and distractedly counts and recounts them, afraid he will lose one. His agitation greatly amuses two passing urchins. They mischievously mingle with the children and Carl's next two counts show an increase in his family. He takes them to his apartment. He excitedly telephones the hospital that some one must come for the children. Evening arrives, also some dinner guests. Dorothy among them. The children are locked in a bedroom with Carl's man, Perkins, who is commanded to keep them quiet if he has to bind and gag them.

Marie arrives while the guests are at the supper table and makes such a fuss that Perkins gags her too, but not until she has managed to shriek frantically for help. The startled guests rush to the bedroom and are horrified at the sight that confronts them. Carl finally succeeds in explaining the situation.

THE CRIMINOLOGIST (Sept. 25).—Clay Bradford, a medical student, and William Martin are rivals for the hand of Bess Allem. She marries Martin, and Bradford goes West to practice. Some time later, while out hunting, Martin falls over a cliff. The accident brings about a strange transformation of character and obliterates the past. That night he crawls into a box car and is soon on his way out West. After a vain search, both Bess and Martin's mother believe him dead; but he has drifted into the settlement where Clay Bradford is practising, and as Lone Bill he is feared and despised by all. At last he is captured by the sheriff and his posse, but not until he has been severely wounded. Dr. Bradford is called to attend him and recognizes his old rival. Lone Bill does not remember him, however, so Bradford wires Martin's mother, asking her to come at once. Both she and Bess arrive, but Martin also fails to remember them. They are broken-hearted, when Dr. Bradford succeeds in getting the county official to agree to allow him to operate on the criminal. The operation is successful; Martin regains his own personality and all ends happily.

PERCY THE BANDIT (Sept. 27).—Percy is employed at a ribbon counter in a department store. Percy is married, but this does not prevent his acting the gentleman to young and pretty customers. One day Percy is doing his best to meet the requirements of an attractive girl when a stout matron demands immediate attention. Percy tells her she must wait. The lady summons the floorwalker, who gives Percy his pay check. Percy goes home discouraged. His little wife cheers him up and a bright idea strikes them. They will go West. Percy and his wife arrive at a small Western town at a time when the populace is wrought up over the announcement that a reward is offered for the capture of Red Pete. The cowboys threaten untold deeds of valor by which they intend to capture their marauder. Big Sam, a bad man, is especially violent in his designs and it looks black for Red Pete.

Percy takes his little wife to the hotel and sets forth to look the town over. He sees the notice and his courage ebbs; he does not approve of violence. He is glad that his wife made him put those two pistols in his pocket. The day is warm and Percy is very dry. He asks a cowboy where he can get a drink. The cowboy tells him "in there." Percy enters nervously; it is a saloon. He arrives at the bar as Big Sam is about to settle an argument with a six-shooter. Percy requests a glass of water and is immediately the center of attraction. Percy repeats his mild request. It is too much and Big Sam takes matters in hand. He tells Percy that Red Eye is the drink in these parts, and being thirsty he will drink Red Eye and moreover the other gentlemen in the establishment will drink with and on him. Percy is alarmed and backs away. He draws the guns and is astonished at the manner in which the men put up their hands. He gets a brilliant idea. "I am Red Pete," he cries. He makes the bar man take off his apron and wrap all the cowboy's guns in it. He lines them up against the bar, makes Big Sam stand on his head and forces them to drink water. He makes his getaway in haste and runs like a hare to the hotel, where he collapses.

THE FORECLOSURE (Sept. 19).—Mexican Joe held a mortgage on old John Watkin's place. He used that mortgage to press his suit for Jessie's hand. His persistence caused the old man's death by heart failure, and roused the ranch boys to a perfect fury. This was especially true of big James Wilcox, ranch foreman, who loved Jessie. On the death of her father, Jessie, refusing a hat collection from the boys, went her way alone. Then James took the matter into his own hands. How he brought prosperity and happiness out of woe and poverty you should see for yourself.

WHITE TREACHERY (Sept. 23).—The cowboy, crafty and unscrupulous, desired the beautiful Indian girl. How he wooed and won her, only to meet his own doom, makes a thrilling and beautiful subject.

BAD PETE'S GRATITUDE (Sept. 25).—Bad Pete eyed the collection box with greedy eyes. The little minister gathered his funds, with which to build a new church, and started for the bank. His pretty daughter, Claribel, much loved by John Walling, accompanied him. Charley Hicox hated John and loved Claribel; so when Bad Pete held up the minister, Hicox saw an opportunity to throw the blame on John. This he did and nearly succeeded if Bad Pete's baby had not taken sick. Claribel nursed the child back to life, and Bad Pete, to square himself, confessed the hold-up.

THEIR HERO SON (Sept. 26).—The old couple dreamed long of the return of their Hero Son. They had not heard from him in many years; so, one day, they wrote at random, sending many blessings. The Hero Son, leader of a band of mountain thieves, held up the mail man. By sheer chance, he came upon the pitiful letter. His heart melted, the years rolled back, and the Hero Son determined to give up the life and go home. On his way the sheriff got him, wounded him and searched him. The sheriff's heart was touched. He bore the fast-dying man to the old homestead, pinned a sheriff's star upon him and deposited him in the old mother's arms for the last time.

CALAMITY ANNE'S WARD (Sept. 30).—Hardened by her experiences in a renegade camp, old Anne would scarcely be deemed capable of sympathetic impulse, yet she displays that she has a great big heart full of sympathy for the orphan girl so unceremoniously entrusted to her care. She performs her duty and watches over the welfare of her ward so that even her master's plans are utterly frustrated. Just how the ranger got into the camp, met the orphan, and accomplished her rescue, forms the subject of this excellent photoplay.

THE RENEGADE (Oct. 2).—When Lew Sommers deserted his pretty wife he proved that he wasn't right. The kindness shown him by the country sheriff, who gave him aid when he was injured by a fall from his horse, was rewarded by his trying to make love to the sheriff's sweetheart; again he proved he wasn't right. The appearance of his wife on the scene put him in a very embarrassing position, and he concluded to again pull stakes, but not without purloining some properties not his own. This proved his undoing, and he soon found the strong arm of the law out after him. Just how the sheriff came to be suspected of crime and his vindication, makes this picture the more interesting.

FATHER'S FAVORITE (Oct. 3).—John Allen was a prosperous ranchman, but was of the idea that his oldest son, Tim, was especially built for work and that John, Jr., his youngest son, was better adapted to play the part of a gentleman. John Jr., was not slow to take advantage of conditions, but little did he appreciate that he was playing the culprit and that his brother, although he had but few of the pleasures of life, was possessed of a much nobler character. When John, Jr., fell into evil ways and was in a fair way to spend a term at the workhouse it was Tim who spared his father from what would have been a bitter disappointment and paid his brother's penalty, and when his sentence had been expiated, he again bore the burden of responsibility for his brother's weakness, for which he was cast from his home by the unjust mandate of an irate father.

LUX.

ONLY A PRIVATE (Sept. 27).—A young soldier receives news from home that his parents will be turned out unless they can find the sum of one thousand dollars. As he has not the most remote chance of securing such a large sum of money, the young fellow is heart-broken. A foreign spy hears of the young ranker's misfortune and offers him one thousand dollars if he will admit him to the powder magazine whilst he is on duty. Unable to resist this temptation, the young soldier consents. However, on the night appointed, he relents and chooses the path of honor sooner than that offered by the spy. Instead, therefore, of admitting the spy to the magazine he bars his way. However, the spy is not so easily turned aside and the soldier falls 'neath his relentless hand stabbed in the back. The spy then enters the magazine and obtains the necessary information; in order to efface

It is that wonderful, exquisite sweetness "Kubelic" draws out of his fiddle that makes his meal ticket spell $1000.00 per hour. A horse fiddle makes more noise but

"What a Difference!"

It is that quaint "humanly human" way "Whitcomb Riley" puts jingles together that makes him loved and famous. Not such great English but his "beat on the heart-strings"

"Makes a Difference."

It was the realism, fine arrangement of color and striking study of light and shadow that immortalized "Rembrandt." A circus ONE SHEET is sometimes even more striking but

"Oh! How Different!"

It is a Motion Picture when you only show "Flickering Shadows" that are meaningless, dull, indistinct, without perspective, roundness or depth and almost without interest. But on a "Mirror Screen" this same picture "comes to life," shows clear, true and sharp. Every detail is visible and not a shade, gleam or shadow is lost and "Believe Me"

"There IS a Difference."

It is a Motion Picture Theatre when your equipment and light is poor and you have a bum curtain. But the "Mirror Screen" insures you a great light so that an ordinary film shows like a FEATURE in comparison. Every foot is so realistic and natural that folks are spell-bound because pictures on a "Mirror Screen"

"Are Different."

It is the Extra Nickels over expenses that means Profits, Bread and Meat and some of Life's Luxuries. It is the "Mirror Screen" that will create a sensation in your theatre, bring the crowds, and it is the only way to get that Wonderful Light WITHOUT EYE-STRAIN. The old and young come and the pictures on the MIRROR are so delightful to look at that they won't miss a reel and that "Keep Them Coming" is what makes, in your bank balance,

"Such a Great Difference."

we want to tell you of it: The other day an exhibitor dropped in at our office and it did not take us long to convince him. Amongst many of the questions asked was this one: "A sixty-day release should look fairly good shown on your screen, should it not?" Well, we guess it should. Happening to have the following ABSOLUTELY genuine letter in our files we "showed him":

Winchester, Ky., July 31, 1912.

Gentlemen:

We think that we owe you something else besides paying you the price asked for the RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN you sold us. We thought at the time of purchase you were overcharging us on account of the seeming high price we paid you, but after using it for thirty days we find that it was the cheapest investment we have made since going in the picture business. You can make sixty and ninety day releases look like first run with your screen. If we could not get another we would not take ten times the price we paid for it.

We also desire to thank you for the courteous treatment we received at your hands, for you did more than you promised to do. You may refer any one to us.

Yours respectfully,

any signs of his visit he sets fire to a case of powder. Meanwhile the wounded sentry crawls into the room and attacks him, the two are struggling fiercely when the powder catches fire, the spy is killed outright by the explosion and the soldier is seriously injured. After lingering for many weeks, he recovers from his wounds, the joy of his regiment knows no bounds and his officers are proud of him, 'midst all this honor he learns that his comrades have paid off the debt his parents owed.

RELIANCE.

BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN (Oct. 2).—Jack Adams, spokesman for workmen in a factory, pleads with the owner, Griscom, against a twenty per cent cut in wages. Griscom refuses to consider the men's side, so the men walk out. Jack, seeking work, at another factory, is "black-listed." He leaves in an ugly mood. Unable to find work anywhere, he is reduced to starvation. His wife needs a doctor. Jack sends a note to Griscom pleading to be taken back. Griscom answers, "Glad to see you so humble, but you can't work for me." Jack, desperate, determines on vengeance. Outside Griscom's mansion, Jack is overcome by weakness. Elsie, Griscom's favorite child, finds Jack, and has him taken into the house.

Griscom comes in, suspects Jack's intentions, and accuses him. Jack tells of his terrible suffering. Elsie tries to console him. Jack is overcome. Griscom relents and offers food. Jack refuses. Elsie puts her arms around Jack, and he accepts the food. The touching scene penetrates the armor of Griscom's selfishness, and he offers his hand to Jack, who accepts it.

MAJESTIC.

BELLIGERENT BENJAMIN (Sept. 29).—Benjamin Benton, a quick-tempered bully, comes home and finds his wife in tears. She tells him that while out walking an unknown stranger kicked her beloved poodle, Toodles. On her resenting the kick the stranger was extremely rude. Some weeks later the Bentons go for a walk. Mrs. Benton sees the unknown and points him out to Benjamin, who immediately accosts him. High words follow. Benjamin slaps the stranger, who then proceeds to unmercifully beat Benjamin, and the latter in short time is stretched out on the ground, unconscious. The stranger then takes a card from his pocket and places it on Benton's chest, then walks away. Mrs. Benton walks to her prostrate husband and reads the card: "Jim Brannigan, Light Weight Champion." She lifts Benjamin's head and shows him the card, whereupon he looks about wildly and faints again.

A GARRISON JOKE (Sept. 29).—Before his marriage, Lieutenant Harris had been known as a somewhat wild young man. He feels sure that his wife knows nothing of his escapades, but in reality she knows all about them. It is announced in the papers that Miss Katharine Nielson, a former sweetheart of the lieutenant, is to play in the city where his post is located. Some of his brother officers, hearing of this, concoct a plan to have some fun at his expense. They beguile Mrs. Harris into the plot. She writes a letter, in disguised hand, and sends it to her sister, in Kansas City, so that she may mail it to Harris, in time to have it delivered on the first of April. This letter is supposed to come from Katharine Nielson. The lieutenant receives it and becomes very much excited. He informs his wife that he must be absent from the post for a few days, and that she must go to her sister in Kansas City. He helps her pack and rushes her to the depot. She gives him a note before she gets on the train. As the train pulls out he reads the note, which says: "I wrote the letter myself, April Fool!" He looks up to see his wife standing opposite him where she alighted from the other side of the train. His brother officers appear from their hiding place in the depot and the joke is enjoyed by all but the unhappy victim.

THE CALL OF THE BLOOD (Oct. 1).—John Ford, chief of a party of civil engineers, woos and weds a gypsy girl whose tribe are encamped in nearby woods. After two years the chill of normal life palls upon her. With the arrival of spring comes a longing for the woods. From her drawing-room window she sees the light of a camp fire, and unable to resist its appeal, she answers the call of the blood. Forsaking husband and child she steals to the woods and sits upon the earth, attired in her evening gown.

A year later, a gypsy woman peddling her laces near the Ford home, sees doctors coming from the house. She learns from a maid of the fatal illness of the child. Going into the woods she gathers herbs and brews a mystic medicine. Later that night she looks through a window of her former home and sees a despairing group gathered about the child's bedside. When the nurse dozes the gypsy steals in and administers her medicine. The child cries and the mother hides behind a portiere as the father and doctor enter the room. The doctor pronounces the fever broken and the crisis passed. The gypsy looks longingly at her husband and child then steals away. Later she joins her gypsy band and as they pass from the town she looks back once toward her home and her child.

SI'S SURPRISE PARTY (Oct. 2).—Silas Brown, a farmer, prepares to go to the village store on his birthday. While his wife is subjecting him to the tortures of a collar and tie she notices the deplorable state of his clothing, and gives him forty dollars of her butter and egg money as a birthday present, with instructions to buy himself a new outfit from top to toe. At the store Silas meets an old cronie and while they are buying the outfit he absorbs a few more glasses of hard cider than is good for him. The package containing the new suit is placed in the rear of the buggy, and the new hat on the seat beside him, and after bidding the cronie a hilarious farewell Silas drives away.

In the meantime Mrs. Brown has sent the hired man around to invite all the neighbors to a surprise party she has planned in her husband's honor.

On the way home Silas stops on a small bridge and tries on the new hat. The old one looks so shabby that he decides to throw it away and wear the new one. This done he concludes to put on the entire new suit and surprise his wife. The cider has made Silas a little reckless and he removes all his outer clothing and tosses them over the bridge after the hat and when he reaches for the new duds they are nowhere to be seen.

At home the party has gathered and all are anxiously waiting for Silas that the festivities may begin. His wife hears the wheels of the buggy, goes to the door, and after cautioning all the company to keep quiet she flings the door open, and when Silas, attired in his underclothing, a foolish grin and a new hat, steps in the room, the surprise is complete.

THE RETREAT FROM EDEN (Oct. 4).—Bob Hendricks, a wealthy New York artist, comes to the Tennessee Mountains to paint some of the rugged scenery. He obtains lodging with a rough old mountaineer, whose daughter, Nancy, wins Bob's heart at first sight, forgetting her love for her childhood sweetheart, Jack Brown. Bob proposes and the girl accepts him. The old sweetheart sees Bob on the mountain trail. He follows the city man and is watching his chance for a shot, when Bob falls into a raging mountain torrent. The mountaineer dives for the drowning man. When Bob is saved he thanks the other. Bob goes back to the house thoughtfully, and finds Nancy weeping over some old mementoes of her childhood courtship and of Jack. Bob realizes that the girl really loves the other man. He ponders on the matter, and then decides on a big sacrifice to drive the other girl to her surest happiness, at a bitter price to himself. He shows Nancy the worst possible character: is cross and ugly. She shows her sweetness of soul under the trial, but at last believes that he does not love her, and declares she will not wed him. She runs from the house, to their old trysting-place, the Eagle's Nest, high on the mountain crest, where she would kill herself but for the intercession of faithful Jack. She realizes that the old love is the best, and she returns home with the honest fellow. There she finds that Bob has paid his bill and gone back to the city.

THANHOUSER.

PLEASE HELP THE PORE (Sept. 29).—An old millionaire was extremely fond of children. Years ago his wife and infant daughter had died, and despite his great wealth, he was lonely.

One day a young business man called at his office to ask an extension of time on the note the millionaire held. At the first the old man refused, later he promised to "think it over."

It was a Saturday half-holiday in May, and the old man closed his desk early, and went for a walk in the park. There he ran into a children's May Party, and stopped to watch them. One little girl came to him, and made friends immediately.

On the following Monday morning the child's father received a letter which the millionaire had written. In it the father was told that the creditor could not grant any extension of time and that he must pay up what he owed by the following day.

The child saw the tears in the eyes of her parents. She picked up the letter which they had dropped on the floor, and took it with her into the park.

In kitty a hand organ grinder came along about this time, and the problem was solved. Hurriedly she went home; swiftly she prepared a sign like that of the organ grinder. It read "Please help the poor." Then the child took her toy piano, hastened back to the park prepared to entertain the passing public.

She had all of four cents when her "kind old man" happened along. He had hoped to see her, but was astonished to note her occupation. In response to her questions she told him her troubles and confidingly displayed the letter. He read and understood. Then he explained that he would act as her agent, took the pennies and sent a note to the parents explaining that their "talented daughter's successful concert had supplied funds sufficient to induce him to grant them all the time they wanted to settle the debt."

He was a close-fisted old millionaire, but the child had touched his heart. And the promise he made to look after her he kept.

LETTERS OF A LIFETIME (Oct. 1).—The wealthy old bachelor returned to his home after a visit to his club, and found waiting him news that his time on earth was pitifully brief. He had money to pay for the best of medical attention, but doctors could not save him.

For the first time it struck the old millionaire that no man or woman would care whether he lived or died. Essentially selfish, he had never made friends. From his safe he took a package of letters and legal papers. As a boy he and his brother had loved the same young woman. The boy was the favored suitor, and although not engaged, he confidently expected to wed the girl some day. Then a letter arrived from a lawyer. It informed the brothers of the death of their uncle, a recluse and woman hater. He left all his large fortune to them, conditional upon their remaining bachelors.

The old man who now sat musing, had accepted the condition. His brother refused them. The elder boy with the money that had so strangely come to him, lived a happy, careless, heartless life. Another letter told how the brother had achieved the ambition of his younger days and won the woman he loved. Other notes told of poverty and sufferings and unsuccessful appeals for aid to his rich relative. Sickness and want, that might have been warded off by money, cost the life of one of his children, and he bitterly blamed his wealthy brother.

The millionaire mused over these things, and wondered what good his money was after all. Even his relatives were estranged from him, and in his time of affliction he could not appeal to them. While he sat there dreaming over the past, a servant brought him a letter from his brother that had just arrived. In it the writer told of hearing of his brother's illness, and offered to welcome him at his "humble but happy little home." For the poor brother had triumphed over the sorrow of years, and although far from wealthy, he was content, as his declining days were made comfortable by his children and grandchildren. Then he shuddered, for his doctors had only given him a month to live.

THE WARNING (Oct. 4).—Happy in the love of his devoted wife and their child, a young business man found life's pathway pleasant. Then the greatest of sorrows came—his wife died—and he was plunged into gloom. There was no one to correct or guide him, no one to plead with him except his son, and he was a helpless little boy.

One afternoon while the boy was playing in front of the house, the man passes out of the front door. The boy knew he was going to the saloon, and hoping to keep him away from there, timidly asked his father if he would not go fishing with him. The man was in a complacent mood, and consented, but despite the child's protest, insisted on stopping on the way to purchase a flask of whiskey.

At the water's edge, the boy fished, the father drank. Finally the youngster caught a fish, and turned joyfully to show his father, but he was sunk in a drunken stupor and the child could not arouse him. The boy's face fell. He dropped his fishing pole, which slipped into the water. He then wandered off a ways, fell on the sandy beach and sobbed bitterly.

The drunkard stirred uneasily in his sleep, for he had a most vivid dream. He saw himself at the edge of the water, his son fishing beside him. The boy, running about, fell overboard. The man saw it, and tried to go to his aid, but he was helplessly drunk. And, in his dream, he saw his child drown before his eyes. He awoke with a cry of agony, and for a moment believed that his dream was true. The boy was gone, but floating in the water nearby was his fishing pole. He screamed again, and the child, who was nearby, came running up to see if there was anything he could do for papa.

The man clasped the boy in his arms. He had gone on the theory that with the death of his wife his interest in life was gone, never thinking of the claims of his child.

He vowed that liquor should never pass his lips again, and noted with tenderness how his promise brought back the lost look of happiness to the face of his child.

GAUMONT.

THE CONVICT'S BRAND (Oct. 1).—The time that this film depicts is about the eighteenth century, when Napoleon was the much feared and revered Emperor. During his reign the dethroned Bourbons were continually contriving to regain their lost power. One of the dethroned Bourbons' strongest friends and consequently Napoleon's worst enemy was Maximillian Count de Champert, who tried to acquire new allies for the King from amongst Napoleon's own officers. He was captured and brought before Napoleon, who charged him with treason and ordered his death before the next sunrise. Maximillian, however, manages to escape and seeks refuge in the home of Jerome, a village blacksmith.

When Jerome's wife meets the man whom her husband is hiding, she recognizes in him an old sweetheart of hers. A few days later the husband discovers his wife and Count Champert silhouetted against the window, kissing each other. This works havoc on the hitherto happy home and the husband plans upon a revenge, befitting to the usurper of his love. He intends to brand the Count just as prisoners were branded many years ago. He waits for an opportune time, which comes one night when he catches Maximillian near the huge open fireplace. Quickly snatching a red-hot iron, he brands the Count. With this terrible secret, only known to the Count, Jerome and his wife, the victim is sent forth from the house.

The following morning, on the roadside where he had fallen from weakness, he is discovered by a number of the villagers, who wonder who the supposedly escaped convict is. As nobody is able to identify him he is sent to prison, where after spending twelve years, he and a number of his comrades manage to escape. In order to keep out of the way of the police he goes to sea as a sailor. But misfortune still pursues him and the boat upon which he is sailing springs a leak and goes to the bottom. The Count and a number of his fellow sailors succeed in making an improvised raft. One by one, however, the men die of starvation and exposure, until finally Maximillian is left alone. At last he lands and makes his way through the village, which happens to be the town in which Jerome and his wife are living. In the heart of the town he notices a huge conflagration, around which a number of excited villagers stand helpless with the knowledge that one of them is being consumed by the flames. He rushes into the flames, not knowing whom he is going to rescue. He sustains several burns and the acclaiming populace bring him to the best hospital in the town. Little does he know that the man he has saved is his persecutor, Jerome, nor does Jerome know that the man to whom he owes his life is Maximillian. The identification of each is revealed at the hospital, and it is needless to say that Jerome and Maximillian fix up all differences and live happily thereafter. The brand on Maximillian's shoulder has disappeared, owing to the burn he received in rescuing Jerome.

"UNIVERSAL FEATURES."

A PARISIAN STAGE TRAGEDY.—Cecile and Suzanne lived side by side. They had been playmates in their "kid" days and now chums in their womanhood. Cecile's mother was dead and she and her father lived together. Suzanne's mother kept a boarding-house.

A young man, Arthur Gilbert, is rooming with Suzanne's mother. He has been quite sick and the doctor has advised extreme care in attending him. The mother asks Suzanne to help her in turn, a request which Suzanne does not particularly relish. Suzanne being by nature a little scheming minx, runs over next door and asks Cecile if she, too, will not assist in nursing Arthur. Cecile is only too glad to help and comes at once. She grew to care for Arthur.

In time Arthur recovered and, learning of a dance to be given, he asked the two girls if he could not take them. The evening comes and they are dancing. Austin Dow, an opera singer, during a dance which both Suzanne and he are sitting out, meet and are introduced. Dow becomes infatuated. When the evening ended, Dow escorted Suzanne home and Cecile was accompanied by Arthur. As Dow parted from Suzanne he extended an urgent invitation to visit him at the theater, which Suzanne most anxiously accepted.

Arthur has asked Cecile to become his wife and she has agreed. Suzanne called at the theater and there the lure of its footlights claimed her. Dow proposed that he prepare her for the stage, to which she consented. Suzanne learned quickly. Cecile was the first to reach her side and congratulate her after her first performance and success. Arthur, too, was there. The fame and glamor which had come so suddenly to Suzanne dazzled him. These thoughts made him forget Cecile. He tendered Suzanne his hand in congratulation. Suzanne moved into the next room and a slight nod from her meant he was to follow where they might be alone. So in there Arthur kissed her. The days pass. Soon his wedding day arrives. He leaves for Cecile's home. A note is delivered to him from Suzanne. She has written asking him not to marry Cecile, for it would ruin her life to lose him.

Cecile is in her bridal robes, her father and guests are waiting for the now past due bridegroom. A note is delivered to Cecile. She reads it, then falls in a swoon. Her father has her taken to her room and reads the note. It is Arthur's. He has written that his heart is not his own; he cannot marry her. For weeks Cecile lies abed. The doctor tells the anxious old father that nothing but Arthur's return can help or save her. The old gentleman determines to seek Arthur.

Suzanne is tiring of Dow and Arthur. Suzanne and Arthur are among a merry crowd when someone calls sharply for Arthur Gilbert. It is Cecile's father. The old gentleman is gently, but firmly led out of the room, unsuccessful in his attempt.

Greater and greater grew the fame of Suzanne. She was dined as fabled princesses dined, and the rich brought jewels to her feet. Poor fool that he was, Arthur called and called and each time nicely spoke her maid, "Miss Suzanne is not at home." One day he hid in her home till she should appear. He heard her in the music room talking to another. In he rushed; hot words were spoken as he poured forth a truthful denouncement of Suzanne. Her wealthy admirer resents his words and Arthur, now but a fiend of jealousy possessed, turns upon him and grabs him by the throat. Then help arrives from the servant and the police take him away to jail. As though naught had happened, Suzanne and her wealthy admirer set forth to attend a supper to be given in honor of her one hundredth performance. Cecile has read of this supper to be given Suzanne. To that supper room she will go and steal an entrance and there be revenged against the woman who had stolen her own from her. And then to the river, ending it all.

Suzanne and the diners have just finished applauding a marvelous dancer, a woman with a revolver sprang through the crowd and is denouncing Suzanne. Then follows a leveled arm and a pull of the trigger. But her arm is knocked down. She misses her mark and flees in excitement. It was Cecile.

A woman is pulled from the river and taken to the station as an attempted suicide. A young man is brought in, but a minute later charged with felonious assault. This is the first time in many months that Cecile and Arthur have met. Then the hand of the jailer falls on Arthur's shoulder reminding him to follow to his cell.

Fatalists argue it is fate. The call-bell had rung for the actors. The lights had gone on. In the center of the stage came a lightning flash, followed by an explosion. Flames sprang forth and fairly gulped the tinsel and netting that hung about. It was but a second till all was flame and smoke. In one mass rushed the actors from place to place to escape, but everywhere there stood a wall of flame. In her dressing-room awaiting her call Suzanne asked her maid "what is that smell of smoke?" The maid opened the door and in darted the tongue of the elemental monster. Through the flames jumped Suzanne only to meet the greater fire beyond. Down the steps she ran and there lay those who were dead from fumes, fright and the stampede. She cried as she gasped and choked, but no help came. Slowly she sank as she fought onward, and last came her end. Her eyes closed, her heart claimed repentance. She was dead.

Arthur was soon released. He went at once to Cecile, who was awaiting him in her wedding gown.

—Silver Your Curtain With Silverit.—

MR. EXHIBITOR:

You make a mistake if you don't use SILVERIT. DO YOU WANT A LIGHT, CLEAR PICTURE WITH DEPTH AND RICHNESS, or a dull, foggy picture?

Your machine and light cannot do it all. If the surface of your curtain has no reflecting powers, how can it reflect the light?

Alabastine or any flat white surface absorbs the light, making your picture look dull, foggy, and artificial.

SILVERIT is a silver paste and can be polished like a mirror.

Will increase the light of your picture 100% over aluminum or alabastine.

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

Scene from Ashes of Memory

An exceptionally strong drama showing how one man who, because he has misused entrusted money, is forced to seek refuge in Mexico; and later in life his finer instincts are the means of saving the reputation and career of the son of his former sweetheart.

The principal role of this picture is played by Harry Von Meter. His work in this picture is not only a credit to the AMMEX Film Co. but will be admired by all who appreciate strong action and good performing.

9c per foot and posters furnished. Release date Wed. Oct. 2nd, 1912.

THE LOVERS REUNITED

A Western Coquette.

Bud, a young cowboy, bashfully proposes to the popular Mary and is as bashfully accepted. Not even a kiss seals the compact. Soon after, Hamilton, an Easterner, visits her father on business and becomes attentive to Mary, and, flattered, she carries on the flirtation. Bud jealously protests, but is calmly given back his engagement ring. When, however, the two men come to blows over Mary, and Bud is injured, her true love for him reappears. She reproves Hamilton and once more accepts the ring from her bashful lover.

WORKING DAY AND NIGHT

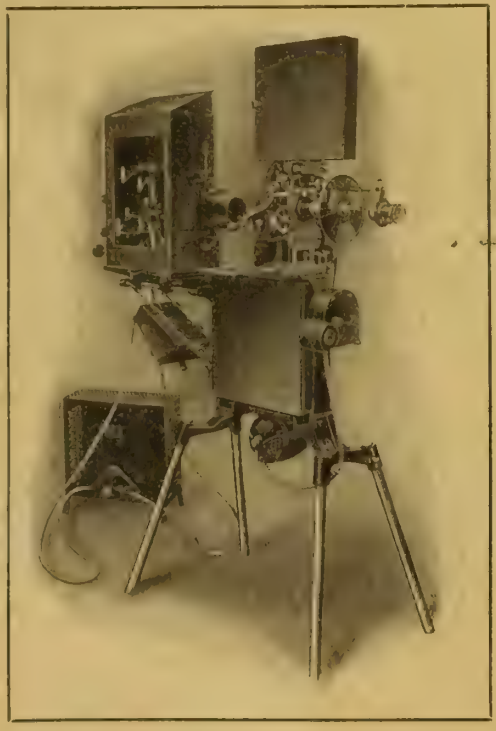
TO MAKE DELIVERIES ON

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A

That's one thing—among many—that Power's Cameragraph does. It works "Day and Night," every day in the year. It stands up under wear and tear.

And because of the recognized superiority of this machine, we are now working "day and night" also to keep abreast of our orders.

Already possessed of the largest factory in the world producing Moving Picture Machines, we have, this week, been compelled to greatly enlarge our quarters.



Business is wonderfully good with us, but we reassert this is no spurt. It is a healthy increase and is due to the fact that the trade knows they must have the best, and are realizing WHO MAKES IT.

In a word, our growth is the result of absolute merit which has kept Power's Cameragraph at the head for fifteen years.

Let us write you about our latest model No. 6A. Let us tell you of our many new improvements—our Loop Setter for one thing.

Power's does over 60 per cent of the Moving Picture Machine Business. Why? Because it is stamped with the approval of the Moving Picture Industry as the best machine on earth.
